LIFE IN A MAN-OF-WAR.

Discipline to Which Jack Tars are Subjected—Systematic Subordination.

In order to understand a man-of-war it is primarily necessary to consider her as formed of many parts, all arranged together under the predominant law of subordination. Thus one may speak correctly of the captain and officers, or of the seamen and marines of a man-of-war. But all such broad divisions require to be subdivided, and in reality the whole body is made up of small parts, each of which resembles the other, as far as the principles on which it acts are concerned, and each of which, though with functions of its own, is related to all the other parts. Taking the crew, for example—the men, as they are called, when spoken of as distinct from the officers—we find them divided by grades not less important than those which divide the officers themselves. There are able bodied seamen and ordinary seamen. The able seaman is a finished sailor, not only able to do all the usual work, below and aloft, but to take the helm and the lead. The ordinary seaman is a less qualified man, receiving less pay, but will probably rise from that to the higher rating by and by.

But if the mere term "seaman" would imperfectly describe one of the men, so the mere term officer would equally imperfectly describe one of the officers. Not only are there the officers proper, from captain to naval cadet; there are different classes below these. There are the warrant officers, boatswain, gunner and carpenter, and the petty officers, quartermaster, boatswain's mate, master at arms, etc. These, however, are not all the grades in the scheme. There is a captain to each top, a coxswain to each boat, a captain of the forward, captain of the after guard. Subordination, therefore, interpenetrates the whole body social of a man of war; it does not only act broadly, but minutely; nor generally only, but in detail. Subordination and classification are, in fact, the two great principles which regulate everything afloat. Subordination teaches a man that he must obey—and whom. Classification teaches him how he must obey—and where. The corner stone of naval subordination, then, is the authority of the captain. He commands the ship, even though there should be a rear admiral on board in command of the fleet.

Though essentially a living unity, a coherent individual whole, yet a man-of-war attains to be this by dint of a careful division and adjustment of parts. Her crew is classified in several distinct ways, according to the different classes of duty that develops upon them in different parts of the ship's daily life. Thus a ship has to be sailed. For that purpose her crew are divided and appointed to particular stations where they go when nautical operations are on hand. There are forecastlemen, foretopmen, maintopmen, and an afterguard which works on deck and does not go aloft. Each of these sets of men has its captain and second captain; each top its midshipman, and at the summons, "Hands reef topsails," or what not, everybody knows where to betake himself and where his work is.

Again, a man-of-war has to be fought. For that purpose her crew are divided and appointed to particular stations at "quarters." There are the forward maindeck quarters, and after upperdeck quarters; forward upperdeck quarters, after maindeck quarters and so on. Each man belong to a particular division and a particular gun in the division and a particular number in the gun; so when the drum and fife call him to quarters he knows just as well where to go as he knew where to go when the boatswain's pipe called him to make or shorten sail.

Once more, a ship has a social as well as a naval or military life, and men eat, drink and sleep there, as in a village or a barrack. Accordingly, the men are divided into messes—each mess having its own table at a certain place on the lower deck, and one member of the mess being cook, and going for its share of provisions to the galley each day. So, too, every man has his bag for his clothes and his hammock to sleep in, and has prescribed hours and places for the use of both. And since a ship, as a whole, never sleeps, there being no such complete suspension of life possible in a ship as in a country mansion, all the officers are divided into three watches, and all the crew into two. The public opinion of a man-of-war is as definitely known and felt as that of a town. The men have their favorite officers and their unpopular officers—just as the officers themselves give a certain well understood status to each of their own body, and have a tendency to split their messes into cliques, according to taste and inclination.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Granite Slab of Enormous Size.

To separate from the main ledge a slab of granite 354 feet long, 3 to 4 feet thick and 11 feet wide, is no ordinary feat to accomplish. But this has been done at the Flynt Granite quarry, in Monson, Mass., and by the means usual in quarries for separating slabs or blocks from the main ledge. A row of wedges were set, several hundred in number, and the workmen beginning at one end gently and carefully tapped the wedges, moving by degrees down the line, until the other end of them was reached, when the same operation was repeated.

In this manner, by careful and patient application, aided by favorable conditions of the weather, the slab of the above phenomenal size was successfully separated from the main rock. The value of this immense slab, if it could have been transferred safely to one of our large cities, at not too great cost, would have been several thousand dollars. And it seemed almost sacrilegious that it was necessary to cut it up into smaller blocks for transportation and finally used for ordinary building purposes.—Scientific American.

The Work of Early Astronomers.

The completeness of the work done by the early astronomers is shown by the fact, recently stated, that out of the 6,000 or more nebulæ now known the Herschels had discovered 5,000.

A DOUBTFUL LULLABY.

I hear in a room up stairs,
She is singing a child to sleep,
As I come in unawares,
From the twilight soft and deep.

And over my heart it seems
There is stealing a thraldom new,
And into the land of dreams
I feel I am carried, too.

O! baby upon her breast,
That she soothes in the room above,
The name of your dream is—rest;
The name of my dream is—love.

How Dimes Are Made.

The process of dime making is an interest- one. The silver bullion is first melted and run into two-pound bars. These in turn are run through immense rollers and flattened out to the thickness of the coin. These silver strips are then passed through a machine which cuts them into round discs of the ex act dimensions of the coin, ready for the presses, the strips first having been treated with a kind of tallow to prevent their being scratched in their passage through the cutters. The silver blanks are then put into the feeder of the stamping presses, and are fed to the die by automatic machinery at the rate of 100 per minute—48,000 being turned out in regular working days of twelve hours.

As the smooth blanks are pressed between the ponderous printing dies they receive the lettered and figured impression in a manner similar to that of paper pressed upon a form of type, at the same time the piece is expanded in a slight degree, by which the milling is formed on its rim. The machine drops the completed coin into a receiver, and it is ready for the counter's hands. The instrument used by the counter is not a complicated machine by any means, as one might suppose. It is a simple copper colored tray, having raised edges running across the surface at a distance about the exact width of a dime.

From the receiver the money is dumped on the board or tray, and as it is shaken rapidly by the counter the pieces settle down into the space between the ridges. All these spaces being filled, the surplus coin is brushed back into the receiver, and the counter has exactly 1,250 silver dimes, or $125, on the tray, which number it requires to fill the spaces. The tray is emptied into the boxes, and the money is then ready for shipment. The dime does not pass through the hands of the weigher, as does the coin of a larger denomination. One and one-half grains are allowed for variance or "tolerance" in all silver coin from $1 down, and the deviation from the standard in the case of the ten cent pieces is so trifling that the expense of weighing the coin of this denomination is dispensed with.—Manufacturer and Builder.

Beans Three Times a Day.

"Whenever I tackle a plate of beans," said the advance agent as he leaned back in his chair, "my alleged mind and memory revert to a season I put in with a road show, otherwise a circus, traveling by wagon. One Saturday afternoon I dropped into a little town called Saccarappa, in the state of Maine. There was but one hotel in the place, and not having the entree to the society columns, as it were, I placed myself beneath its roof. When supper time arrived I was seated in the dining room ere yet the coatless landlord had ceased to agitate the bell that called the victims to feed. The persecuted heiress that piloted the provender asked me if I would have tea. I realized the hopelessness of my case, and said I would. She retired, reappeared, and placed before me a dish of hot beans, a plate of bread and butter and a cup of tea.

"One Sunday morning I broke my fast with a boiled potato, a cup of something, and some cold beans. The midday meal was an improvement, and consisted of a piece of corned beef, boiled potatoes and baked beans. For supper we had tea and cold beans, and for breakfast Monday morning dallied with a cup of something and a dish of hot beans. When I left, I expressed my regret to the still coatless landlord that I had not been able to enjoy the beans for which his house was noted. If I live to be a thousand years old I'll never forget the expression on his face as he started back and said 'What! y' didn't git no beans? Well, by gosh, I'll see about that.'"—Oil City Blizzard.

How a Toad Removes His Skin.

It is safe to say but few people have ever been fortunate enough to catch a toad in the act of changing his skin.

A man who professes to have been an interested eye witness to such a transaction describes the novel operation as follows: I observed him pressing his elbows against his sides and rubbing downwards. His movements were so singular that I resolved to find out, if possible, what he was up to. After a few smart rubs his skin began to burst open along his back. "Now," said I, "old fellow, you have done it;" but he appeared to be unconcerned, and kept on rubbing until he had worked his skin into folds on his sides and hips, then, grasping one hind leg with his fore paws, he pulled the skin from the leg as slick as a man would remove a pair of pants, then stripped the other hind leg in the same way.

He next took the cast-off portion of his cuticle and pulled it forward between his forelegs until he could catch it in his mouth, whereupon he forthwith began to swallow it; then, by raising and lowering his head, swallowing as the head bent forward each time, he stripped off the skin underneath until it came to his forelegs. At this stage of the curious proceedings he grasped one of the forelegs with the opposite paw, and by much pulling stripped off the skin; changing hands, he stripped the other, and by a slight motion of the head, all the time swallowing, he drew it from the neck and swallowed the whole. The entire operation occupied but a few minutes of time.—St. Louis Republic.

Marry a Gentleman.

It was excellent advice I saw lately given to young ladies urging them to marry only gentlemen or not marry at all. A true gentleman is generous and unselfish. He regards another's happiness and welfare as well as his own. You will see the trait running through all his actions. A man who is a bear at home among his sisters, and discourteous to his mother, is just the man to avoid when you come to the great question which is to be answered yes or no. You need not die old maids. But wait until the prince passes by. No harm in delay.

You will not be apt to find him in the ballroom. Nor is he a champion billiard player. He has not had time to become a "champion," for he has had too much honest, earnest work to do in the world. I have always observed that these "champions" were seldom good for much else.

Be wary in choosing, girls, when so much is at stake. Do not mistake a passing fancy for undying love. Marrying in haste rarely ends well. Do not resent too much the interference of your parents. You will travel long and far in this world before you will find any one who has your true interest at heart more than your father or mother.—Philadelphia Record.

Its Altitude Is Great.

"You seem to have plenty to eat here," said a visitor at Pike's Peak. "Yes, indeed: we live high here."—Yenowine's News.

Oratory in Southwest Missouri.

Down in southwest Missouri four or five years ago a town had all arrangements made to whoop 'er up on the glorious Fourth. The citizens had contributed in a liberal spirit, the day was fine, and the crowd large and enthusiastic. The orator of the day was a slim, cadaverous looking man from St. Joe. To stand off and look him over, you'd have bet your last dollar that an old gander could have run him all around a ten acre field. There were some lofty spirits in town that day, and one of them was Jim Bucks, a mixture of patriotism, high jump, and rough and tumble. Jim sized the orator up, determined to have some fun with him, and took a seat directly in front of him as he stood on the platform to speak. The orator hadn't spoken a hundred words before Jim interrupted him. He did this twice more and was warned to go slow. He didn't go much on dreams or warnings, however, and watched for another opportunity. Pretty soon the orator said:

"And so this little band of pilgrim fathers set out with stout hearts and unwavering faith in search of"——

"In search of skunks!" interrupted Jim.

The orator made a long jump, lighted down on Jim Bucks, and inside of two minutes he had him licked so thoroughly that Mrs. Bucks would have passed him by for a splatter of pumpkin jelly which had dropped from a dinner basket. When satisfied that his work was thoroughly done, the orator returned to the platform and continued in the same calm and unruffled tones:

"—liberty of speech and freedom of conscience, and they found them at Plymouth Rock."

He went on and delivered a really eloquent speech, lasting nearly an hour, and he was just concluding when Jim Buck crawled out from under a wagon half a mile away, where he had been laid, and queried of those around him:

"Say! is that feller still speakin' or fightin'? Durn me, but I didn't 'spose oratory included jumpin' Jim Buck's liver out of his body!"—St. Louis Republic.

Dan Remembered Him.

"Taverner" tells a good story in The Boston Post, apropos of the subject of memory in horses: "I happened to be the witness of an odd scene the other day which when recounted may possibly amuse the reader. One of those not infrequent, but I must confess usually fictitious necessities, had arisen which take me to a stable—on this occasion to a large establishment in the vicinity of Chardon street. It was about 5 o'clock in the afternoon and various people were starting for home, among them a man and woman who had a remarkably intelligent looking gray horse. Just as he began to trot down the lane by which the stable is reached from the street, a stout "party" who, I noticed, had been watching the gray very intently, suddenly cried out in a loud voice: "Dan, don't you want a piece of cake?"

The horse stopped short, pricked up his ears, looked around and uttered a faint whinny of recognition and assent, nor would he go on until the stout man had come forward and explained his interference. It appeared that several years before he had brought the horse from Vermont, where he had owned him for some time, and as the beast was particularly docile he had taught him the true sense of the question the sudden asking of which brought the animal to a standstill. It is well known that horses never forget a person or place, and scarcely an event. No matter how much time has elapsed or how greatly the horse may have changed in disposition, one word from a former master will establish immediately the old relation between them.

Electricity from the Body.

Dr. R. D. Mussey, professor of surgery in Dartmouth college, in The American Journal of Medical Sciences for January, 1838, gives an account of a Mrs. B——, a married lady, about 30 years of age, residing in Grafton county, N. H., who gave out sparks and snaps continuously for thirteen weeks, when this power was entirely lost and did not return again. The discovery of this faculty was a great surprise to the lady, and subsequently caused her some annoyance. Though Mrs. B—— wore a silk dress at the time of the commencement of the phenomenon, this was exchanged for cotton and flannel successively without affecting the result, and the manifestations were found to be due to the lady's own person and not to the clothing or other conditions. Dr. Mussey's account is supported also by Dr. W. Hosford, the lady's family physician.

Phenomena of this sort, when manifested, do not seem to be confined to any one portion of the human body, though occasionally localized. A Capuchin friar is mentioned by Dr. Schneider, whose scalp was a veritable reservoir of electricity. Whenever he removed his cowl a number of "shining, crackling sparks" would pass from his bald pate, and this phenomenon, which was definite and strong while the monk was in good health, continued perceptible after three weeks' illness.—Hyland C. Kirk in Popular Science Monthly.

He Was Shamming.

In a large factory a workman, in wielding his hammer, carelessly allowed it to slip from his hand. It flew half across the room, striking a workman in the left eye. The man brought suit in the courts, and, although an eminent oculist, after an examination, claimed that no apparent injury could be detected, claimed that his eyesight was destroyed, and refused all offers of compromise. As the law requires owners of factories to pay all claims for damages resulting from injury during work, the owner, though confident that the man was shamming, had about made up his mind that he would be compelled to pay the claim. The day of the trial a further test was made. The oculist for the defense had a pair of glasses made, the right eye being of red and the left eye of ordinary glass. He brought also a black card with a sentence written on it in green ink. The plaintiff was ordered to put on the glasses and read the sentence, which he readily did, thus proving himself a perjurer, as the sound right eye, being fitted with a red glass, could not distinguish the writing—the combination of green and red producing black, which, on a black ground, was, of course, not visible—and the left eye, which he claimed was blind, was the one with which the reading had been done.—American Analyst.

How to Open an Oyster.

Hold the mollusk firmly in a cloth, insert the point of a knife neatly just before the edge of the upper shell, give a quick, decided pressure till the point is felt to glide along the polished newer surface of the under shell; force it sharply to the hinge, give a smart wrench rather toward the right hand and off comes the shell. Then pass the knife quickly under the oyster, separate the attachment, let it fall into the lower shell, floating in its own juice, lift it quickly to the lips and eat it before the delicate aroma has been dissipated into the atmosphere. There is as much difference between an oyster thus opened and eaten as between champagne frothing and leaping out of the silver necked bottle and the same wine after it has been allowed to stand for six hours with the cork removed.—Boston Herald.

They Needed Stretching.

A well known business man is very particular about his dress, and is seldom seen out, even on a week day, unless dressed genteelly. He is, however, extremely absent minded, and a funny thing happened to him the other day. His church was giving a sociable, and he promised his wife, who had gone early to assist in the preparations, that he would come in the evening. He remembered, however, that he had also promised her that he would put down a chamber carpet for her at the first opportunity, and it occurred to him that no better time could offer, as he was alone at home and had the time.

So he changed his $12 wide cut pants and put on an ancient pair that had hung unused for a long time, for he wished to save the wear and tear the new pair would get by wearing them while putting down the carpet. When on they reached to a point half way down between his ankles and knees, he then recognized them as ones he used in washing his carriage, which accounted for the shrinkage. The carpet job taking longer than he had expected, he found that he must hurry a little to be in time, and he forgot all about the short pants, while he put on some fine style in the shape of high collar, fancy tie, low cut vest, etc., and hurried off to the festive scene.

Arriving in the ante-room, and taking a glance at the mirror to be sure that everything was all right, he entered the hall and looked around for his wife. He noticed that people looked at him rather hard, but he thought it must be on account of his more than ordinary tony appearance. Finally he saw his wife coming toward him. She stopped, white and still as Lot's wife, for one brief moment, then grasping him by the arm, she dragged him out of the room.

"What in thunder are you trying to do with this coat? Do you want to stretch it into the shape of a night shirt?" said he.

"Stretch your coat! No, sir! I should say that your pants needed it more!"

Then for the first time this absent minded man glanced down at his legs and realized the situation. Now when he plans to go into society his wife insists upon inspecting the dressing before starting and not waiting till he arrives on the scene.—Springfield Homestead.

Noble Unselfishness.

On the 27th of December, 1885, one of the American line of steamers, the Lord Gough, while on its way from Liverpool to Philadelphia, sighted a Gloucester fishing schooner in distress. The wind was blowing a gale, and the schooner, almost disabled, and with three or four of her crew already washed into the ocean, was flying the signal for help.

Capt. Hughes of the steamship saw the fearful peril which a rescuing party must encounter, but his call for a volunteer was promptly answered by the mate and a crew of brave men, and preparations were made for the desperate trip. To the astonishment of all, while the boat was being lowered, the flag of distress on the schooner's mast was hauled down.

Perplexed at this movement, the hardy rescuers hesitated; but it was finally decided that the boat should go. With great difficulty the schooner was reached, and on her deck were found twelve men utterly without hope except from outside aid. It was necessary to make two trips, and the bold sailors of the Lord Gough took half the suffering men and toiled through the wild waters to their own ship, and returned as soon as possible for the others.

When all were safe on the steamer Capt. Hughes asked the schooner's master, Capt. George W. Pendleton, why he had lowered the distress flag. The reply was:

"We saw that you were preparing to make an effort to save us, but we saw, also, that it was a sea in which it was very doubtful whether a boat would live. I said then to my men: 'Shall we let those brave fellows risk their lives to save ours?' and they answered 'No!' Then I hauled down the flag."

The story is a noble one on both sides. The men on the schooner were worth saving, at all hazard, and the men on the steamer were worthy to save them.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A Moorish Cup of Tea.

When a party of guests enter the house or the tent of a rich Moor one of the near relatives of the host is charged with the duty of making tea. He squats in one corner, having on either side of him a large server or platter. Upon one of these servers is a number of cups, and upon the other a sugar bowl, a box of tea, a pile of fragrant mentha leaves, a copper apparatus for heating water and a tea urn. The teamaker sets the water to boiling with a little fuel, and then pours the boiling water into his tea urn, quickly adding to it some tea and some sugar, and allows the compound to steep a few moments. Then he pours out a cup of the tea and tastes it, smacks his lips, sniffs the odor of the liquid, and draws a deep breath—all with an air which says, "I am going to get this tea just right."

The chances are that he does not find the compound to his taste at the first attempt, for he pours the tea in his cup back into the tea urn, adds a little sugar or a little tea, and pours out another cup for a second test. This process goes on, the teamaker tasting his tea and pouring it back again, until he gets it just to his mind. Then the guests are called, and if any one of them does not finish his cup, he is expected to pour it back into the urn, for it is the custom in Morocco to take three cups in succession, and the tea making has to be begun over again. The first of the three cups offered is plain tea with sugar, and the two succeeding cups are perfumed with mentha or vervine. In preparing these successive kinds of tea, the cups go back to the teamaker, and change hands at the next serving without any washing.—Montreal Star.

A Queer Phenomenon.

Capt. Thompson, of the schooner Challenger, has in his possession a little black earthenware jar which was taken, with valuable jewelry, from the tomb of one of the Peruvian Incas near Pisaqua. No tinted pottery is made by modern Peruvians, and it is estimated that this jar was made in the time of Cortez. The captain also secured one of the Inca's teeth. He visited the battlefield of Tarapaca, where the Chilians and Peruvians met Nov. 17, 1879, and the Peruvians, after losing 4,000 men, were forced to retreat, leaving their dead unburied.

"In any other country," said the captain, "these unburied corpses would have been reduced in a few weeks to skeletons by wild animals or the elements, but for over 100 miles on either side of the battle ground there is not a spear of grass. There are, consequently, no wild animals, and the bodies remained undisturbed by them. The soil, too, is strongly impregnated with nitrate of soda, and this, in connection with the hot, dry atmosphere, has converted men and horses into perfect mummies. Seen on a bright moonlight night, as I first saw it, the battle appears as if fought but a day or two ago, the colors of the uniforms being still bright, and the steel of their weapons untarnished. Inspection by daylight, and a curious phenomenon is observed. The hair of the bodies of the men has grown since death to a length of from two to four feet, and the tails of the cavalry horses are now so long that, if alive, they would trail far behind on the ground."—San Francisco Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Treasures of Delphi.

Let us trust that the American school at Athens may speedily obtain funds enough to do some good diggings at Delphi. It makes one's heart leap to think of the treasures they are sure to find there, notwithstanding the thefts of Nero, Constantine the Great and other scoundrels.

To get a picture of Delphi as it was in the best days of Greece, after the building of the great temple by the Alcæmondæ, read the tenth book of Pausanias. He tells us of four temples in a row at the entrance to Delphi. He then describes what was to be found within the sacred precincts of Apollo: A statue of Phyallus of Croton, a bull in brass by Theopropus the Æginetan, votive offering and marble statues from Tegea and Lacedæmonis, a brazen horse by Antiphanes of Argos, the chariot of Amphiaraus, the horses of the Tarentines in brass, the statues of the Epigoni, the treasury of the Sicyonians, statues of Leto, and Apollo, and Artemis shooting at Tityus; treasuries of Athenians, Thebans and Syracusans, hung with the spoils of war and adorned with statues; a portico built by the Athenians with money which they got in war from the Peloponnesians; a brazen head of the Paeonian bison, a bronze dragon offered by the Greeks in common after the battle of Platæa, statues of foot soldiers and cavalry by Onatas, the votive axes of Periclytus, a bronze wolf, a gilt statue of Phryne by Praxiteles (offered by herself), statues of cavalry leaders seated on horseback, a brazen ox from Eubœa, a statue of Sardus, a horse offered by Callias the Athenian, a bronze statue of Homer on a pillar, the tomb of Achilles' son, the Lesche or public hall, with an enormous number of painted figures of Polygnotus and statues innumerable of Athena and Apollo. The great temple of Apollo was adorned, as to its eastern architrave, with gilded shields from the battle of Marathon. On the pediments were statues of the gods and of the setting sun, of Hercules slaying the Lernæan hydra, Bellerophon and the Chimæra, Dionysius and a giant, etc. These are only a small fraction of the riches of Delphi as described by Pausanias. A single one of these works of art, if recovered, would be worth the price asked by the Greeks for the right to the whole site.—Boston Transcript.

Siam's Sacred Bird.

"Ha, ha, ha! Why don't you get a chair to sit down on?"

The voice was rather loud, but not disagreeable, and the tone somewhat muffled, as of a person half choking with laughter, says The San Diegan. The salutation came to the newsgatherer as he was on his daily perambulations about the city, and was traced to a handsome blue-black bird in a cage hanging under the shade of a fig tree at the residence of Dr. Gildea, on Sixteenth street, near H. As the reporter approached nearer he was received with more laughter and inquiries as to whether he came to see the "mino," if his health was good, etc. A few inquiries directed to a pleasant faced lady near by elicited the information that the bird was the sacred mino of Siam, which as a nestling had been smuggled from the temple where it was bred by a roving sea captain, and sold to Dr. Gildea, at Honolulu, some eight years ago.

Minnie, as she is called, is about half the size of a crow and nearly as black. In the sunlight the feathers take a blue and green tinge, and there is a spot of white upon each wing and a necklace of bright yellow about the throat. The bill, which is large and strong, tapers to a point, and is orange hued near the head and lemon colored at the tip. The prominent eyes are dark and bright, the feet and legs lemon colored. The bird is valued at $250, but specimens have been known to bring $1,000 in the United States, where but few of them have ever been brought. The species is carefully guarded in Siam, and as none are ever sold they can only be obtained surreptitiously.

Exorcising the Devil in India.

A strange case of superstition was recently investigated before the coroner of Bombay. A Hindoo mill hand, named Ramji Daji had for some time been suffering from swollen knee joints and pains in various parts of the body. He went to the mill to get some wages due to him, and on his return was taken ill on the road. He was brought home on the back of a friend in an almost unconscious state, and was placed in a sitting posture, being held up by his father. A man named Deo, who was present, suggested that he was possessed of a devil, in order to expel which Deo swayed himself about in front of the sick man, seized hold of his hair, and demanded of the devil who he was. Not receiving a reply he struck the deceased violently with a rattan, when the latter fell back in a dying condition; but before his death another friend took the rattan and beat the deceased, both men swaying their bodies to and fro and professing to be possessed with the spirit of a god. The flogging was intended to drive out the devil. Daji died almost immediately without a complaint. The widow narrated all these facts to the coroner, and described both floggings as being very violent. The medical evidence showed that there were several bruises on the back and an abrasion on the right hip but that the cause of death was hemorrhage from rupture of the spleen, which was probably not due to the flogging. The jury found a verdict accordingly, adding that there was no evidence to show how the spleen became ruptured.—London Times.

The Forests of California.

The evergreen redwood rises straight as an arrow to a height of from 200 to 300 feet. There are whole tribes of the coniferæ, dozens of specimens of cypress and cedar, a variety and relationship of the oaks that drives the botanist wild, ravines filled with the flowering dogwood, sweeps of glistening manzanita, spattered patches of the red berried buckthorn, rifts of the pink petaled rhododendron, sanguinary patches where stand the Judas tree. In this favored country also bloom and bear the pomegranate, fig, olive, almond, apricot, lemon, orange and the nectarine. The camelia is a tree, the heliotrope a stout shrub; geraniums are used for scarlet hedges; the calla lily is a weed. And to round out this riot of luxuriance—this saturnalia of foliage, fruit and flower—nature sows every spring, in and through it all, a crop of wild oats such as was never dreamed of by the original prodigal son.—Harper's Magazine.

Gulls and Their Young.

Every bird watches over and cares for her own nest, though the numbers are so great and the tumult so excessive that it is difficult to conceive how each gull can distinguish her own spotted eggs, placed in the midst of so many others, exactly similar in size, shape and color; and when at length the young are hatched and are swimming about on the lock or crowded together on some grassy point, the old birds, as they come home from a distance with food, fly rapidly amid thousands of young ones exactly similar to their own, without even looking at them, until they find their own offspring, which recognizing their parents among all the other birds, receive the morsel without any of the hungry little creatures around attempting to dispute the prize, each waiting patiently for its own parent, in perfect confidence that its turn will come in due season.—New Orleans Picayune.

THE RACE FOR WEALTH.

Some of the Incentives to and Consequences of Mammon Worship.

The number of prosperous business men in the United States is probably greater than it is in any other country in proportion to population. There are two good reasons why this should be so. One is that it is a virgin country possessed of great natural riches and affords every man an opportunity to get ahead, and the other is that it is inhabited by men of unequaled energy and shrewdness who know how to make the best use of their advantages. If this condition of prosperity were attended by some principle which would effectually operate to check the desire for inordinate wealth, the American Nation would be the best substitute the world affords for that blessed community which was the dream of Sir Thomas More. But there is no such principle operative on any scale wide enough to produce the desired effect. The love of money is the root of an evil that can not be extirpated without making some radical changes in the constitution of human nature. The man who has his $100,000 of capital will strive to make it $500,000, and when he reaches that point in nineteen cases out of twenty he is just as anxious to raise it to $1,000,000 as he was in the beginning to accumulate $100,000.

The millionaire is the natural product of the man and his opportunities. There are instances of successful men with philosophy enough to "shut down" on themselves when they have acquired a "competency," but the instances are very few. The protest which the circumstances of the time compel the public censor to make is not so much against the millionaires as against the spirit which the contest for wealth has engendered and the evils that are begotten of the strife. There is not the least objection to the accumulation of large fortunes so long as the rules of honesty and fair play are observed. It is because of the demoralization produced by the innumerable departures from those rules that the press and the pulpit are to-day uttering in concert their reproaches and warnings.

It would not be impossible to find in the history of mankind a chapter more disfigured by the calamities which mammon worship entails than the chapter which records the career of Americans who have sought to get rich by "short cuts" since the close of the civil war. The strain of this ambition has wrecked families, polluted the sources of justice, corrupted Legislatures, turned away the currents of trade, blighted once unsullied reputations, and produced more crime and misery than any other influence, with the single exception of the thirst for strong drink. It is the acute mania of American society. The roots of the evil can be traced down into the very soil of the family circle. It begins with the influences that revolve around a man's own fireside. By those influences the wife is transformed into a conspirator against her husband. The rivalries of fashion are the prolific author of the curse. The love of dress and display, the desire to outshine our neighbors, the impulse to indulge in extravagant hospitality are like so many consuming fires that burn at full blast without any adequate reckoning of how long the the fuel is likely to hold out. Vanity Fair becomes a furnace in the flames of which good name and fortune ultimately perish like so much stubble.

When a man has achieved that stage of prosperity where his wife and daughters first feel that they can venture to enter the gay circle of "fashionable society" he stands on the danger-line. If he has the courage to refuse to advance beyond it his safety is assured. But in the great majority of cases he lacks the courage. Conjugal and filial affection prompts him to acts of indulgence and blinds him to the possible consequences of them. His first mistake is to keep from his wife the fact that the purchase of a costly garment, or the removal into a more showy residence, or the gratification of her wish to ride in her own carriage, or any of the other numerous acts by which the fatal career is inaugurated, is an expense which he can not afford. If he were but brave enough to say to her that this indulgence was beyond his means, and she were a woman to appreciate his candor, he might be saved. But the reflection which generally controls him is, what a disappointment it would be to her if he declined to gratify her ambition. Most men who have suffered the consequences of this kind of reasoning will acknowledge, I think, that their initial error was in omitting to take their wives into their confidence as to their business affairs. The woman is too proud or too trusting to solicit it. She would like to know exactly what her husband's resources are, but she will not seek a confidence he does not ask her to share. In most cases he assumes, therefore, that he knows what he is about, and her wants and tastes multiply in total ignorance of his measure of ability to meet them.

In the family council, where the wife or daughters, emulous of their neighbors' display, resolve to imitate that vanity, is planted the upas destined to poison the atmosphere of all their lives. At the second when the husband or father hesitates whether he shall overdraw his bank account to gratify the wife or daughters is the first false step taken which changes the whole character of his career. Whether the pressure of the necessity, leading him to depart from honorable and conservative methods of business, results in the rapid accumulation of wealth, or in despair and bankruptcy, the influence is established that, multiplied thousands of times, produces the extortionate monopoly and the soulless millionaire. In this generation, in this century, or within the next one hundred years we may not expect to get rid of a system entailed upon us by vanity, false pride, the love of splendor and the dangerous rivalries of fashion, but if we ever get rid of it all our redemption will be owing primarily to the good sense and beneficent influence of woman.—Brooklyn Eagle.

WINE FROM ORANGES.

The Non-Intoxicating Drink Made From California's Surplus Orange Crop.

The wonderful crop of oranges which has been produced in California has led to the manufacture of a new and non-alcoholic wine from that fruit. A gentleman who has traveled extensively in California in conversation with a reporter thus described the process: "In San Gabriel, Los Angeles County, Cal., where the sweet navel or seedless orange grows to great perfection and in large quantities, the Mexican residents made from it a wine, not unlike the May wine of the Germans. This wine, of course, had to be consumed at once, or it would spoil. But the idea was suggested by this practice that good wine could be made from sweet oranges, and the question was how to make the wine so that it could become a marketable and profitable commodity. As soon as the souring was overcome, more money had to be invested. This was accomplished after considerable money had been lost. The sweetest oranges are selected, those of the navel or seedless kind; but not until they are fully ripe. Oranges when shipped to market for eating are generally packed green, and ripen on the way. Not so with those used for wine. When gathered, a machine removes the peel, leaving only the juicy pulp. The pulp is placed in a large vat, with layers of the Angelica grape sugar. The pulp and sugar are allowed to remain together about three weeks, when, by the aid of a jack-screw press worked by machinery, the whole of the juice is squeezed out. This is run off into casks and purified every month for about two or three years. It is kept from souring by the addition of distilled glycerine preservatives, and at the end of that time is considered fit for general use. It is drawn off into casks of a commercial capacity, and is ready for shipment.

"As transportation, especially to a distance, would cause the wine to muddle, it is again refined at the end of the journey and the dregs precipitated before it is put into bottles, in which condition it is sold to the general public. The wine has already been exported to England and many parts of Europe."

"Is not the wine fermented in some way."

"Not at all. It is purely the juice of the orange, a simple fruit wine, and contains no alcoholic spirits whatever. People eat oranges after meals as a digestive; now they can partake of the pure juice alone for the same reason. I think it will soon outrival any of the mild drinks of the present day."

"Then it is simply a still wine without any intoxicating qualities?"

"Yes, in its original form. But it can be made into a sparkling wine by the introduction of carbonic gas. By diluting the orange juice one-half, and adding a gas, a beverage equal to champagne can be produced, without any of its intoxicating or enervating effects. This has been done, and temperance drinkers have been delighted with it. As a summer drink it is far better, according to medical men, than lime or lemon juice, as it does not leave such bad results as sometimes follow the drinking of lemonade."

"Is it expensive to the consumer?"

"If it were not for the time required to bring it to perfection, it would be very cheap. In this city and in Europe the cost of transportation has to be added, yet with this it could be sold by retail with a profit, say about seven dollars per case for twelve quart bottles, or eight dollars per case for twenty-four pint bottles. Singly, I suppose it would depend upon the profit desired by the retailer. In California it is very cheap and is now being extensively used, even where fermented wines are to be had at a low price."—N. Y. Mail and Express.

Peculiarities of Cape Town.

Cape town has some fine buildings and good, broad streets, but the latter are badly paved, and the town is said to be fearfully dusty in summer and very muddy in winter, so that those who can afford to do so live out in the suburbs or in the pretty villages on the railway to Wynberg. The shops are good and plentiful, but except here and there a display of ostrich feathers or the skins and bodies of wild animals, there are few native productions besides wine, and, although South African port and Cape sherry have got themselves a bad name, there is no reason why they should retain it if proper care were taken in the manufacture. The long avenues of oak and other trees planted by the Dutch in bygone days are a feature of Cape Town of which it may fairly be proud, but the country immediately around is very destitute of trees.—Cor. London Society.

—A song with a title, "There's a Sigh in the Heart," was sent by a young man to his sweetheart, but the paper fell into the hands of the girl's father, a very unsentimental physician, who exclamed: "What wretched unscientific rubbish is this? Who ever heard of such a case?" He wrote on the outside: "Mistaken diagnosis; no sigh in heart possible. Sighs relate almost entirely to the lungs and diaphragm."—Youth's Companion.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL
FRIDAY JANUARY 3 1890

The law that stumpage must be paid for timber cut on public land works a hardship and injury to Owens Valley. No doubt the law is just and works well in general, but here is an exception. The timber fit for lumber is found only in places very difficult of access. Machinery must be taken up on pack animals and all supplies and tools in the same expensive way. To get the lumber out miles of very expensive flumes must be built and endless expense is needed to keep this in repair. So costly is all this that when the lumber is got out to where it can be sold the market price leaves little or no profit. In fact there is hardly an exception to the rule that saw mills in Owens Valley have been run at a loss to the owners. And yet lumber is so necessary to the settlers that for many years past two or three mills have been run from time to time to supply an indispensable material. The land from which this lumber is taken is utterly worthless. The trees grow on the steep sides of mountains and among the high peaks where the land is not worth ten cents a township. If stumpage shall be exacted for cutting logs in such places not another mill will turn a saw in the county. This cannot fail to work a hardship to the settlers and will be a serious check to the settlement of the valley. If our Representative in Congress could secure any modification of this stumpage law, so that the settlers of Inyo county could cut logs without paying stumpage, it would be the only direct benefit Inyo county has ever had from Congress.

The California State Board of Trade has called a convention of the northern counties to meet at Sacramento on the 17th inst. to discuss ways and means for preserving the navigation of the Sacramento river. This organization is doing much for the northern and central portions of the State, but not the least attention is given to California east of the mountains. This part of the State would receive more attention and more would be done for its development if it were a part of the kingdom of Hawaii instead of nearly one-third the area of California.

The Reno Gazette suggests that the whole of California east of the Sierra Nevada mountains be admitted to membership in the newly organized Board of Trade of Nevada. This is a wise and practical suggestion; our interests are very closely allied; the organization is entirely a business matter in which we could act with the people of Nevada and promote our own interests as much as theirs. Some steps should be taken carry out this suggestion.

It seems that something little short of a craze prevails among English capitalists to invest their money in American enterprises. An offer of eighteen million dollars has been made for the Granite Mountain mine in Montana.

How to Deal with Diphtheria.

A committee of the Massachusetts Medical society, appointed to confer with the state board of health relative to diphtheria, officially recommends that the society, both collectively and individually, should foster as far as they can a proper sentiment in the community as to the contagious nature of the disease, and more especially should encourage its earliest possible recognition and report to the board of health in each individual case. By these methods a public sentiment will sooner or later be created justifying and requiring from the proper authorities a suitable separate hospital for the treatment of infectious and contagious diseases; such, for instance, as are required by law in England, with ample means for support, and over which there shall be absolute authority, as already exists over the hospital for smallpox. In the absence of these necessary facilities for thorough isolation it is impossible to exercise an efficient control over the various dangerous diseases that from time to time become epidemic in the city, and which have gained a permanent foothold here.—Boston Journal.

Lady Travelers.

A great deal is said and written tending to show that the gentler sex know as little about traveling as the sterner sex know of fashion plates, but it is about time to call a halt on that proposition. Traveling by rail has become so common that there are very few ladies, emigrants excluded, and among that class the men know as little as the women, who are not perfectly capable of taking care of themselves on a journey of a few hundred miles. They are as speedily served with tickets as the average man, and more readily disposed of than many of the latter, and ask fewer questions as to when the train will depart, where it can be found, how often they will be compelled to change cars, etc. The age is progressive, and in railroad traveling the ladies are keeping right up with the procession.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

"KIVERED."

Were I asked to name the races of the south, I should answer: "White, black, and the mountaineer." The latter belongs to a distinctive race. While he may be classed with the white as far as color goes, his tastes, habits, characteristics and mode of life are peculiarly his own. If he likes you he will make any sacrifice to oblige you. If he hates you he will seek your life with a determination which nothing can damp. The great world beyond his mountain home is a sealed book to him. He lives in himself, by himself and for himself.

I was riding over the spur of the Cumberland mountains, which Gen. Morgan (Federal) held so gallantly while Buell and Bragg were driving each other by turns over Kentucky, when I lost my way. The mountain trails of the south are dangerous puzzles to a stranger. They run up and down—twist—turn—dodge—lose themselves in dark ravines and seem to suddenly end in dark and lonely gaps. There is a feeling of loneliness which you cannot shake off, and a feeling of anxiety which rides with you and keeps every sense alert. Every rod of the trail has its ambush, and every quarter of a mile its cliff, seemingly ready to fall upon you. I came to a spot where three trails branched away. It was luck and chance. I took one which led me into a long, dark ravine, where the summer sun has never yet touched the icicles on the rugged rocks nor cooled the mountain rivulet pouring over the moss grown ledges. After going a mile I felt that I was wrong, and was about to turn back when a voice suddenly called out through the semi-darkness:

"Stranger, you ar' kivered! Throw up your hands!"

If that command ever reaches your ears, obey it at once and do your arguing subsequently. It means that your head or heart is in point blank range of bullet or buckshot, with a finger resting on the trigger and ready to pull if you don't obey the summons.

Up went my hands.

After a long half minute a mountaineer, who had a dead sight on me with a double barreled shotgun across a point of rock twenty feet ahead, stepped into view on the trail and said:

"Stranger, slip down!"

I slipped off the saddle.

"Now lead yer mule up that ravine to the right!"

I simply saw a man six feet high, straight as an arrow, long haired, whiskers unkempt, dress, that of a mountaineer. Yes, I saw more. He held the gun fair for my breast. One suspicious move on my part and I was a dead man. He spoke in a low voice, but there was that in his tones which chilled me. Without a second look at him I took the mule by the bits and led him up the ravine. We had not gone twenty rods before I scented a whisky still. At the end of five rods more we were in a rude camp. Two moonshiners sat on a log, guns across their knees, and back of and below them a still was running off its extract of corn.

"One o' them spies!" said the man who had followed me as I let go of the mule and sat down on a stump.

"A good ketch!" growled one of the sitters.

"Mighty kind in him to come yere!" chuckled the other.

They were moonshiners, and they took me for a spy sent out by the government official of that district. I looked from one to the other. There was a determination in each look—an implacable sternness of expression which would have warned a genuine spy that his hour had come. Not one glance of pity—not one line of mercy. A prisoner at the stake among the Apaches would have had more hope.

These men were law breakers—outlaws—being hunted after every day in the year. Why? Because they were making a living—keeping soul and body together—in the only way open to them. The bits of valleys in the grim old Cumberlands will grow corn and potatoes. The potatoes are wanted for the table. If there is more corn than the razor backed hog or the shackling mule can consume it is a dead loss. Convey it to market—two days to go and two to come, and sell it for two bits a bushel, and the owner and seller would starve on the way. Make it into a barrel or two of whisky and it will bring cash on the spot, or very near it. It is not to grow rich—not hoping to better his condition—but simply to live. It is against the law of the land. The mountaineer may go ragged and hungry, but he must not distill. It is the only law he breaks. Aye! he even lives closer than most of us to all the commandments. He breaks it because grim necessity forces him to. He is outlawed and hunted that officials may make fees.

I knew all this before I looked into the stern, set faces around me, and I knew why I looked in vain for a gleam of mercy.

"I am no spy," I said, as I looked about me. "I am a traveler making for Cumberland Gap, and I've lost my way."

"Go up that path!" commanded the man who had captured me.

"Not until I satisfy you that I am not a spy."

"Kiver him, Joe!" whispered the man to one of the others, and a shot gun covered my breast again.

The leader ran back down the ravine to be sure that no one had followed us. When he returned he said:

"Say yer prayers, stranger! Joe, when I riz my hand do you plug him!"

"Did any of you ever hear of Joe Rickaby?" I asked, trying hard to keep a steady voice.

"Wall, what if we had?" asked the leader.

"About a year ago I found him in jail in B——. He had been there for several months. He was sick and out of money, and I aided him. Here's his name in my note book. See?"

The man with the gun lowered his weapon and came closer and asked:

"Was anybody else in the jail with Joe?"

"Yes—half a dozen—all moonshiners. I sent in $2 worth of pipes and tobacco, and I got one of them some quinine."

"He's the chap, sure's shooting!" exclaimed the man as I turned to the others.

"On my soul he is!" added the leader as he came up and removed my hat.

"Durn our buttons!" whispered the third.

In a minute more it was all right, and they were shaking my hand so vigorously that my shoulder ached. The humble cabin a quarter of a mile away was open to me forevermore, and it was two days before they would let go of me to resume my journey. The wife at the cabin had more perception than the men. She looked me over and then said:

"Oh! sassafras, but you fellers is all blind! Hain't he Yank all over and all through! Whar's the sunburn? Whar's the lingo? Whar's the hoss pistols? Purty muss you'd hev got yerselves into killin' a Yank, who don't keer if every branch in Tennessee runs cl'ar whisky! Better not be so handy with them guns arter this."

The leader walked beside me for five miles when I left, and as we parted he said:

"Stranger, when I told ye to say yer prayers I meant they should be mighty short. I'd hev given ye about ten seconds, for I wanted to git yer body outen the way. Yer couldn't hev told us nuthin' else to prove that you wasn't a spy. Give this pay a farewell squeeze, and don't lay it up agin me."—M. Quad in Detroit Free Press.

A Plumber's Trick.

The Sanitary News describes a new plumbers' trick, which has been first discovered in Milwaukee, but may be known elsewhere, so that architects and inspectors will do well to be on their guard against it. In Milwaukee, as in many other cities, all soil pipes put up in dwelling houses must be tested by filling them with water. A certain firm, knowing that a defective pipe had been used, contrived to plug it with clay, so that the water applied for testing it did not enter the pipe at all. It is not stated how the inspector happened to find out this ingenious deception, but he did, and the offending firm was reported, and punished by having its license revoked until the defective pipe should be replaced by a new one. Most persons will say that the revocation of the license ought to have been made permanent.—Scientific American.

Professional Advice.

Certain physicians are careful not to give advice to people except when they are formally consulted, or in the strict relation of physician and patient.

One evening, at a social party, a lady was introduced to the celebrated Dr. B——.

"O doctor, I'm so glad to have met you!" exclaimed the lady. "Tell me, what do you do when you have an awful bad cold?"

"Cough, ma'am," said the celebrated Dr. B——.—Youth's Companion.

"This butter, Mr. Spicer," said the dealer, "carried off the prize at the farmers' fair," and Seth spat out a taste of the compound and remarked: "Unless the prize was a ship's anchor and chain cable, I would think the butter could have carried it off easily."—Gro-

A VOICE from Ohio. Here is a portrait of Mr. Garrison, of Salem, Ohio. He writes: "Was at work on a farm for $20 a month; I now have an agency for J. C. Allen & Co's albums and publications and often make $20 a day." (Signed) W. H. GARRISON.
William Kline, Harrisburg, Pa., writes: "I have never known anything to sell like your album. Yesterday I took orders enough to pay me over $25." W. H. Elmore, Bangor, Me., writes: "I take an order for your album at almost every house I visit. My profit is often as much as $20 for a single day's work." Others are doing quite as well; we have not space to give extracts from their letters. Every one who takes hold of this grand business gets up grand profits. Thos. Twaddle vs. Cook Springs M. & M. Co.—Filed summons, proof of publication and affidavit of service by mail.

The Fair Directors meet to-morrow.

All the public schools in the county will be reopened next Monday.

Washouts of railroads caused a scarcity of food for some days at Barstow.

The Directors of the Independence Water Company will meet next Tuesday.

Pat. Clinton came in from Darwin last evening and will remain in town.

Mr T. F. A. Connolly came down from Bishop last Wednesday and is yet in town.

Harry Ober and wife were visiting the old home of Mr. Ober at Big Pine recently.

Mr. R. Hessian, of Big Pine, has been visiting Independence and vicinity during the week.

Mr. and Mrs. Marshall came up from Keeler on Tuesday and stayed in town a few days.

John Barnes has resigned as postmaster at Keeler and James Holland has been appointed as his successor.

H. H. Spears has again gone to Mojave with his freighting team. He left Independence Tuesday morning.

Jacob Pfohl has sold a half interest in the Morning Star mine situated at Cerro Gordo to John Dunphy.

Mrs. Eva Gunn has gone to Lookout to join her husband who is there engaged in working mines in which he is a part owner.

The road to the Riley mill is closed by snow so that no wood can be hauled at present. This has caused Mr. Anthony to suspend operations for a time.

At the Defiance mine at Darwin eight men are at work. They are drifting to make two connections that will greatly improve the airing of the mine and afford much better facilities for handling ore.

Any person wishing to go to Mojave within ten days please communicate with this office.

Among the long list of names sent by the President to the Senate for appointment to office is that of Charles Mulholland for Receiver of the Land Office at Independence.

Chris. Crohn has sold out his farming interest in Sonoma county and intends returning to Inyo. Chris. was engaged in mining at Cerro Gordo several years ago and still has mining interests there.

It is reported from Pioche that men, horses and grading machinery have arrived at that place to begin work on the railroad extension to that place. The extension is part of the Salt Lake & Los Angeles Railroad.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Symmes departed on Thursday morning for Stockton. Mr. Symmes is in very poor health and will try if any benefit can be had from change of climate. It is not certain when they will return.

The Board of Supervisors meet in special session next Wednesday at 5:30 p. m. for the purpose of taking action in the matter of refunding the county bonds. P. H. Mack has secured a purchaser who will take the new 5 per cent bonds at par.

Mrs. Myers and her daughter, Miss Ada Myers, left Big Pine the day after Christmas for their home at Fayetteville, Arkansas. They had been at Big Pine half a year during which time they won many warm friends who parted from them with great regret.

Mr. W. McDonald on the day after Christmas took charge of the office and bar-room of Crocker's Hotel, at Big Pine. Bill does not sport the customary big diamond worn by hotel clerks but he has a warm welcome and no end of kind attention to all guests.

The combination shaft at Cerro Gordo is re-timbered down to the Omega tunnel, a depth of three hundred feet. To the next tunnel below the distance is between three and four hundred feet and the work of timbering down to that point is being pushed as rapidly as possible.

In doing assessment work in the Beauregard mine at Cerro Gordo Jack Dunphy has struck some fine ore. The extent of the body can not yet be determined but it looks as if there might be a good deal of it. Dunphy recently purchased a controlling interest in the property.

On Thursday evening after Christmas snow began falling at Big Pine and came down heavily most of the night. Next morning the whole surrounding country was covered with snow to a depth of about four inches. Friday was a warm, sunny day and the snow disappeared very rapidly. At Independence there was barely a trace of snow.

In the case of Williams against Lane for a desert land location near Bishop, Williams appealed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who decided that Lane should have all of the tract except twenty acres. Now Lane has appealed from the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior and claims the whole of the tract. Ben. T. Williams is the contestant against Lane.

A Fine Property.

The Crocker Brothers have made great improvements on their property at Big Pine and are going ahead with other improvements as rapidly as possible. They have in one body thirty-two hundred acres of the choicest land in Owens Valley. When they took possession of the place three years ago it was in a ruinous condition. Fields were over-run with willows, ditches were filled up and the water run unrestrained, doing injury instead of good. Fences had rotted down and cattle roamed at will, eating up everything that grew upon the place. The buildings were in a dilapidated condition. A fine hotel, large barn, stables and corrals, and a slaughter house have been built. Several miles of excellent fence has been built; the fence is made of palings and wire hung on cedar posts set eight feet apart, and with one barbed wire on top. There is no danger of horses being injured by this fence and hogs cannot get through it. It costs about seven hundred dollars per mile. Barb wire fence of three wires costs less than half as much as the other but valuable horses are often destroyed by the latter and it is no barrier against hogs. Cattle often go through a barb wire fence and do much damage.

The Crockers have set out a good deal of apple orchard and the young trees have made rapid growth; in two or three years they will be yielding crops of as fine apples as ever grew. Along the roads that run through the property rows of shade trees are being set out as fast as they can be planted and in a few years Big Pine will have several miles of the nicest shadiest drives in the valley. A large acreage will be plowed and seeded to alfalfa the coming spring. About five hundred head of cattle are now wintering on the place and are in fine condition. There are one hundred and fifty head of horses on the place and it is expected that about one hundred colts will be dropped this season. The horses are all of the best breed for work animals. Big Pine creek, one of the finest streams in the valley, brings down upon the place a large volume of pure water from the Sierras. Above the town this stream affords an abundance of trout, making Big Pine one of the most attractive places in Owens Valley for visitors. The Big Pine canal runs through the farm and will give an abundance of water for irrigation should any more be needed than is already supplied by the creek. Altogether the Crockers have a beautiful and most valuable property in a pleasant and healthful locality. The water right of the Crockers in the Big Pine canal is worth every dollar the whole of their property at Big Pine cost them at the beginning, all the land included.

Big Pine Canal.

There is no better or more valuable work of the kind in Owens Valley than the Big Pine canal. It heads at a point about seven miles above Big Pine. There is a stretch where Owens river flows south and then makes a sharp bend to the east. Just at this point is a deep slough which continues south. Below the mouth of the slough a matting of willows tied with wire has been sunk and weighted with a great many tons of rock. This has raised the river about four feet and throws a vast volume of water into the slough. About two hundred yards from the river head gates and an overflow gate have been put in. Below the head-gate the canal is sixteen feet wide on the bottom and has two feet fall to the mile. The canal when finished will be about fourteen miles long and the average width of land between it and the river is two miles. There is no better soil in Owens Valley than the land under this canal and now that the work is so near completion there is sure to be a rapid increase in population, business and wealth about Big Pine. The Crocker Brothers say that when their large tract of land shall be put in a thorough state of cultivation and improvement they then will sell tracts of forty or eighty acres to settlers and will not ask more than a reasonable price, enough to reimburse them for the first cost of the property and improvements and fair interest upon their capital. There is no better orchard land anywhere than can be irrigated from the Big Pine canal.

The Alexander Mine.

Scott Broder and his partner, Acunha, are working the Alexander mine in Waucoba. Several years ago John Alexander took out the first ore from this mine; it was found close to the surface and was very easily mined. The second class quality of the ore gave seventeen ounces silver per ton and forty-four per cent lead. At the prices then paid for silver and lead the ore was worth fifty five dollars per ton. The rest of the ore gave twenty-four ounces silver per ton and fifty-six per cent. lead. This ore was then worth about sixty-eight dollars per ton. The cost of getting out the ore to the railroad was so great that Mr. Alexander made but one shipment of eleven tons and then quit work upon the mine. For packing one and one-quarter miles to where the ore could be reached with wagons the charge was three dollars per ton. He had also to provide water for the pack animals at an additional cost of five dollars per barrel, or nearly two dollars to water against each ton of ore. The cost of hauling by wagons to the railroad was four dollars per ton. Then railroad freight and cost of working added to the other expense left nothing for the miner. Now the ore can be got out and worked at far less expense than before and the prospect is good that a fair margin of profit will be left for the miners. The mine is but little over thirteen miles distant from Alvord, on the C. & C. railroad.

Make The Road.

It is proposed to improve the wagon road from Alvord to the Sylvania mining district, by way of Deep Spring. It is estimated that at a cost not to exceed $500 the road can be put in such condition that teams can easily haul twelve hundred pounds to each animal. The pass over the Inyo mountains is easy and there is already a good road over the mountains to Deep Spring Valley. A forty ton smelter will be put up at the mines early in the Spring and there are other evidences that a big business will be done there. By making the proposed road all the business of the district can be brought to Big Pine, Alvord being much the nearest point where the railroad can be reached. The opening up of Sylvania district will make a good market for Owens Valley products of all kinds.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with the medicinal virtues of plants known to be most beneficial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

Good Mining Region.

Mr. G. A. Smith, a real estate dealer and mining speculator of Los Angeles made a trip recently through the Darwin and Panamint country and got back to Independence at the beginning of this week. He says that over a wide region of country he saw many mining claims that he is confident would pay good profit if rail transportation could be had for the ore. Immense quantities of ore in are sight that is too low grade to pay for hauling seventy or eighty miles by wagon as must now be done to get it to a railroad. But if the railroad were within easy reach all of this ore would be taken out, affording employment for many men and much capital. Mr. Smith bonded an antimony mine from Mr. Hannigan situated on the Death Valley side of the Panamint mountains. Mr. Smith says this is a large deposit of antimony and he has no doubt the mine will be a valuable property if worked. He was induced to go into that country in the hope of the speedy extension of the railroad from Salt Lake to Los Angeles, but until this extension shall be made the property has no value. He felt discouraged by recent reports that the road would not be extended beyond Pioche and said that his firm would not now expend any money in opening the mine. He left Independence Thursday morning for Los Angeles.

A Hard Rub.

The total tax of Inyo county, State and county tax, is $34,800.30. The amount of school tax this year is $2,507.07. Total amount of taxes, 37,307.36. The amount now delinquent is about $6,000, or close upon sixteen per cent of the whole. A large part of this deficit is due to the fact that all lands upon which locators have not yet proved up were assessed separately and nearly all locators have refused to pay the tax. But still it must be admitted that it has been difficult for many settlers to get money to pay their taxes.

Joe Danielson, John Curran and William Hannigan have bonded animony mines in Wild Rose Mining District to G. A. Smith of Los Angeles for $3,000. Mr. Smith intends to develop the property and if satisfied with the result will build reduction works near the mines.

Mr. Abial Eugley arrived at Big Pine on Christmas day from Lincoln county, Maine. He came on a visit to his son, Mr. A. K. Eugley, the well known merchant. The old gentleman is aged nearly eighty years and stood the journey across the continent remarkably well, arriving at the end of his long trip in good health and spirits. He expects to pass the rest of his days in California.

Great damage has been done by the recent heavy rain storms to all railroads running to Los Angeles. Miles of track and many bridges and culverts have been washed away. All business and travel over the roads has been stopped and it was expected that the interruption would continue two weeks. The damage to the Santa Fe road is estimated at $200,000 and to the Southern Pacific, $150,000.

Mr. G. A Thede, hotel-keeper at Laws, spent some days at Independence this week. The hotel at Laws belonged to the estate of John Kremkow, deceased, of Bishop, and was sold recently to Mr. Gerckes who is now running it. Mr. Thede has a plan drawn by a competent architect for a new hotel building which he proposes to erect at Laws. Should the hotel be built it will be nearer the railroad than the present house.

Uncle Sam. McMurry is as light hearted as a youth of twenty-one. He says he has waited twelve years and laid awake nights most of the time thinking about the canal and wondering if it would ever be finished. Now his patience is rewarded and his hope almost realized by the near completion of the work. By April first Mr. McMurry and his neighbors will have all the water they want and all of them will have fine properties.

THE ADVANCE OF SCIENCE.

As time rolls on from day to day MAN'S mind is ever on the move, improvement after improvement comes to light and where once an article was extolled to the highest pitch as being the best in the world, now we hear no more of it, and that same article has positively faded out of sight and given place to one of far greater value, and much more effective in its uses.

This same theory applies to the great and modern remedies placed to-day before the public. Years ago, valuable preparations were very scarce, and invariably the doctor was called in to administer to the suffering.

Now for any and all diseases can be found medicines put up from true formulas and of positive merit. THE GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE is the LATEST AND FINEST MEDICINE of the age classed among true remedies and its price is within the reach of all. Hundreds of testimonials are coming in from all parts of the country unsought for and honest in their meaning, we name this WONDERFUL REMEDY THE GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE for it is the GREATEST this century has known. SURE in its work IMMEDIATE in its action. For sale by all druggists.

Lovers of fair play will be indignant to learn that the sun is now shinging day and night at the South Pole.

TWO BIG PRIZES.

A Wandering Arab and a Spanish Truckman Win $20,000 in the Louisiana State Lottery.

Two tickets sold in this city for the October drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery drew big prizes. The lucky ticket holders were Hansa Mohammed, one of the Arabian troupe of jugglers Barnum brought to this country a few years ago, and Anthony Someriva, who, with his son, does the trucking of Hawley & Hoops, manufacturing confectioners, 271 Mulberry st. Mohammed held one-twentieth of ticket 71,323 drawing second capital prize of $100,000. Mohammed's ticket was originally in possession of John F. Cunningham of 128 Clinton place, who exchanged it for another, the number of which he liked better, but which won no prize. All the money in the world that Mohammed had when he bought the ticket was one dollar. He sold a half-interest in the ticket to another fellow-countryman named Habadje, who was performing juggling feats recently in the Bijou Opera House. If Mohammed had retained his entire twentieth part he would have been the possessor of $5,000; but, as he parted with half of it for 50 cents, his share was only $2,500. The money came by check through Well, Fargo & Co's Express, and was turned into crisp $100 bills at the American Exchange National Bank, corner of Broadway and Cedar st. Mohammed was so elated with his success that he went right off to Philadelphia to give Habadje his $2,500.

The $2,500 that Mohammed received was a genuine windfall. He has not been with Barnum for the past two seasons, and was just about able to scrape a living for himself doing odd jobs in the neighborhood where he lives. He thinks the Louisiana State Lottery is a great thing, and he intends, he says, to try his luck at every monthly drawing in the future.

The ticket held by Someriva was number 63,856, and drew one-twentieth of the first capital prize of $300,000. Someriva is a Spaniard and is still with the firm of Hawley & Hoops, and so is his son. When the package containing Someriva's check for $15,000 arrived by Wells, Fargo & Co 's Express from New Orleans, Someriva was so nervous that he asked Mr. Herman W. Hoops to open it. Mr. Hoops drew forth a check of the cashier of Wells, Fargo & Co. for $15,000 and after the express charges were paid, Someriva went to the Emigrant Savings Bank to deposit it. The clerk to whom he handed it scrutinized the check closely, and, convinced that such a poor looking man as Someriva, dressed in the ordinary everyday garb of a truck driver, could hardly be the owner of the check he conferred with some of the officers of the bank. Finally Someriva was sent to Pres't Hoguet, and to him the poor truckman told the history of the check. President Hoguet congratulated him, took the check on deposit and Someriva left the bank laughing at the clerks and feeling like a millionaire. He intends to buy a small house in the suburbs and to buy new trucks and more horses.—New York Daily News, Nov. 9.

Catarrh

is a complaint which affects nearly everybody, more or less. It originates in impure blood, and is aggravated by taking cold. Disagreeable flow from the nose, tickling in the throat, offensive breath, pain over and between the eyes, ringing and bursting noises in the ears, are the more common symptoms. Catarrh is cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla, which strikes directly at the cause by removing all impurities from the blood.

Can Be Cured

"I suffered with catarrh fifteen years; tried all the catarrh remedies without benefit, and was about to try a change of climate, when I took Hood's Sarsaparilla. I would not take any money consideration for the good one bottle did me. Now I am not troubled any with catarrh, and my general health is very much better than it has been for years." I. W. CHAPTER XXXV.

A POPULAR LEADER.

Market hall was full of excited workmen when Curran pushed the door open and stepped in. Some would be orator had been trying to voice the wrongs of the people, but when the whisper ran along the seats that Curran was at the door every head was turned. Then, as if by a common impulse, the whole audience rose to their feet, and the building seemed to tremble with the cheer that burst from the brawny throats. Here was an orator indeed, a man who could set before them their sufferings and wring their hearts with self pity; who could make each soul of them wonder at his own patience.

He made his way slowly up the aisle with simple greetings for his friends, as they stretched out their grimy hands to him. But his smile was so sad and hopeless that every glad face sobered as he passed. He mounted the platform and turned his face toward them. He seemed but the ghost of his former magnificent manhood, but the people cheered him again, and those in the rear leaped upon their seats in the eagerness to see their hero. Then all held their breath to listen; even the girls in the gallery stopped their excited whispering while they waited for his grand ringing tones that had thrilled the faintest hearts so many times before. Would he never begin?

"What is this meeting for?"

The orator his coming had interrupted, was only too glad to explain.

"We don't get our rights. We get a little, but that's all, and we mean to fetch the young boss to his milk to-morrow; don't we, lads?"

A shout of eager assent went up from the crowd. Then all was still again. Now would come the torrent of words of flame. Yes, Curran had stepped forward to the very edge of the platform, in his old habit. But who was the fellow with bandaged head pushing his way so rudely up the main aisle, as if he bore tidings? It must be ill tidings to make him in such haste. But Curran had begun to

"You are making a mistake, my friends—a great mistake. The young master has done well by you, and he will do better, if you will give him time to think. Such mighty ideas as have got into his mind can't be stopped. They will not let him halt long; he must be swept forward. But you must wait for him. You have waited for your cruel and heartless masters thousands of years. Will you only show yourselves impatient and insolent to the first one who shows himself kind toward you? Do you want to make his name an example and a warning for his class? I have heard their scoffs and taunts already—the air is full of them. Look, they say, at the way the people treat the man who tries to help them. Friends, you are making a terrible mistake."

But Curran had begun to speak.

The light of the man's noble genius had flushed his pale cheeks and flashed beautifully in his steel blue eyes. His voice, that had seemed weak and unsteady as he began, rang out its bell like tones again as he saw the sullen faces soften under his matchless power.

"He has made your village blossom by his love; he has brought smiles to your weary children's faces; he has planted hope in a thousand desperate hearts. Do you ask me how I know? I see it in your eyes. I see it in the way your heads rest on your broad shoulders. And will you use your new manhood to do him injury?"

But the man with the bandaged head had reached the platform, and at this very moment, when the orator paused to let his meaning sink into the hearts of the people, he touched Curran on the shoulder and whispered a few hurried words in his ear.

The people saw their hero's face blanch. He turned to the fellow with a look that would break a man's heart, and seemed to be asking him a question. As the agitator listened to the reply his knees trembled under him and he sank into a chair, and still the messenger of evil bent over him and kept whispering with poisonous breath into his ear. At last Bailes stood back from his victim, who bowed his head upon his hands. Curran's whole body shook with the violence of his passion.

The inert people waited. They knew nothing else to do. Their hero might have died before them, they would never have thought to stir from their seats. But he rose at last, and Bailes grinned diabolically behind him. They would hear another story now.

"Friends, you have heard what I said." He spoke as if a great weight was upon him and his voice came slowly. "I repeat it, be patient with your young master; he means well by you."

But Bailes rushed forward and, tearing the bandages from his head, threw them upon the platform at his feet. Disease had settled in his bruises and his face was frightfully swollen and disfigured. He might have been a ghoul or a gnome instead of a human being.

"Revenge him, men," he screamed, throwing up his arms, "if you have any spirit in you. I have just told him—some of you knew it—how that boy has stole his wife and spit on the laws, as if they were not for the rich like him."

It was more like a groan than a shout that went up from the crowd before him, which only waited a word from the bowed, broken man they loved, to become a bloodthirsty mob. Would he give them that word? He had leaped to his feet and thrown out his long right arm in its grandest gesture, and the murmur of the people died down. His face was as white as a dead man's, an ashy white, but his eyes flashed lightning.

"Whose wrong is it then, this hideous creature's or mine? I will settle my own grievances, I need no mob to right me." Then Curran paused a moment. When he began again it was in a lower tone. "Besides, the man is wrong," his voice trembled like a child's. "I have no—no," he almost broke down, "I have no wife—I am—I am not well, I must go to my bed, but before I go I want to be sure you will make no mistake to-night or to-morrow." He folded his arms across his broad chest in a sublime effort of self-control. His blood boiled in mad fever, every moment was worth a world to him, agonizing pictures floated before his dimmed vision, but he would not stir from his post till he had conquered this mob. "Philip Breton has shown himself fair to you, be fair with him. If he never did another thing for you—he—he has yet deserved your—your patience. You will excuse me now, I will see you to-morrow, but I need rest. Can I depend on you?" He did not even look at them; his attitude, as he waited with downcast eyes, was of a man who talks in his sleep.

"Yes—yes," shouted the people, and then he turned and stepped off from the platform. He came down the aisle very strangely. At first he would hurry and notice no one. Then, as if by a mighty effort, he would walk very slowly, then faster again. Then he would stop short and put out his hand to some perfect stranger.

Many eyes watched him curiously when he separated from his eager friends at the door of the hall and walked rapidly away. If Curran had turned off to the road that led to Philip Breton's house on the hill he would not have gone far alone, but he did not even look that way so long as the half tamed mob could see him. And the people scattered in disappointment to their homes.

But Curran is no longer walking in his first direction; he has turned on his heel and made a route for himself across the fields. His face is pointed toward the lights that yet shine down at him from the stone house on the hill. And the roads are not straight enough for the errand he is on, nor is walking fast enough, he breaks into a run. Now he falls over a low fence so violently that a limb might have been broken, but he only loses his hat and runs on, his long hair shaking down over his pale set face as he runs. His breath comes like the puffing of a locomotive; he can hear his heart throb louder than his footfalls.

What does he seek? What will he do when he looks again on his faithless and dishonored wife and on the man who has put this deadliest shame upon him? Punishment can wipe out nothing, vengeance never assuaged one pang of human anguish yet. But mercy or pity or reason are fled from his maddened soul to-night, while the furies whip him on.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

TOO FOND A HUSBAND.

The drunken lawyer very nearly fell as he tried to step off the counting room piazza, and almost made up his mind it would be more desirable to lie down in some soft spot and go to sleep, than take the long walk he had set himself. But the cool breeze seemed to refresh him marvelously, and in another moment he despised the green hollow under the elm that had looked so inviting, and hurried up toward Philip Breton's house. He shook his head wisely as he walked. It took a pretty smart man to get ahead of John Giddings, drunk or sober. The young mill owner wasn't nearly as frightened as usual. Something was in the wind. He ought to have watched him closer lately, but Giddings concluded he was in good time yet with Breton at one end of the village, his wife at the other, and himself, the acute lawyer, between them.

The lawyer had walked as far as Silas Ellingsworth's house, when he caught sight of a pair of horses on a fast trot, drawing a close coupe. Elegant pairs and chariots of that description were not so common in Bretonville as to make it doubtful who might own this one, and besides it must have been an occasion of peculiar necessity that called for such unaristocratic haste. Giddings was perfectly delighted with his own sagacity.

He knew human nature pretty well. When a man gets another in an unpleasant situation, he must count on the unfortunate struggling to escape. If it happens to be a woman, he need not be so watchful—women are all fatalists. But it takes a pretty smart man to get ahead of John Giddings.

"Whoa, whoa, I say." The lawyer had thrown himself in front of the excited horses, and the driver had to pull up to keep from running over him. "Whoa, I say."

Then he stepped to the door of the carriage and turning the knob threw it wide open. The moonlight revealed a woman surrounded with carpet bags and shawls. A thick brown veil concealed her features, but Mr. Giddings took off his hat to her.

"Mrs. Breton, I believe."

"Why yes," she did not recognize him, "but I am in a hurry," she said nervously drawing back.

"Drive on Henry."

"No, you don't," insisted Giddings, mounting the steps. "I guess you don't know me." His liquor began to overcome him again, "name's Giddings, aint goin' far, are you?"

"To Europe," she answered quickly, recognizing him at last. "I have no further occasion for your services, I have paid you, haven't I?"

"Not s'much as your second husband's paid me since," he gurgled. "If you're goin' so far, guess I'll go to, I like your family, Miss Breton."

"Drive on, I command you," she screamed, and the horses started. Giddings lurched forward, and Bertha put out her white hands and tried to push him back. He clutched, with an oath, at something to hold to, but she loosened her India shawl and the man carried it with him into the ditch. But he leaped to his feet.

"Hold! stop! police! police!" but Giddings had no sooner spoken than the village policeman laid his hand on his arm.

"Here I am, sir, what'll you have?"

"Stop that carriage; arrest that woman, she is a criminal." Giddings had shaken off the policeman's grasp and started to run after the carriage.

"You must be very drunk," said the other, overtaking him, "that is Mr. Breton's wife."

"I know that," screamed the lawyer, "and I tell you to stop her, let me go."

"More likely you're the criminal. Hallo, what you doing with that Indy shawl. Guess I'll have to lock you up. Come along quiet, now."

But Giddings was perfectly frantic. He fought with his feet and hands, and with his teeth, kicking, tearing and biting like a wild beast.

"Don't let her escape, I say, never mind me, I'll give you a thousand dollars. I'll tear your heart out, you villain. Stop her, stop her!" The officer grew angry at last, and drew his billet, but still the fellow struggled and screamed like a wild creature, till blow after blow paralyzed his arms, and finally stretched him unconscious and bleeding on the ground.

"Premens," growled the policeman, as he lifted him to his feet soon after, and led him along, subdued at last.

But a woman had stood in her window as the carriage had rolled by, and she had recognized the equipage, too. A sudden change came over her face.

"Where are you going, Jennie?" Her husband looked up calmly from his paper.

"Out a minute," she hardly looked at him, "that is all."

"But it is almost 9 o'clock, my dear, what can you want out?"

Her breath came fast, and two bright red spots burned in her cheeks. Mr. Ellingsworth had never seen her so pretty. He must keep her so a few moments. He stepped to the door and turned the key, then he put it in his pocket and threw himself back on his chair again.

She faced him with flashing eyes.

"How dare you—am I your slave? I want to go out."

Her husband settled down cozily in his seat, and smiled his old brilliant smile. She had never seen him laugh any more than the rest of his acquaintances. He might, perhaps, have laughed before an intimate, but men like Silas Ellingsworth have no intimates.

"How lovely you are when you are angry. I see I have made a mistake in being so amiable with you. What treats I have lost. Why, you are better than an actress, my dear. Such coloring as yours does not hurt the complexion."

Precious time was flying; the carriage had rolled away out of sight; her victim had outwitted her—her hate would be balked forever, and all for her husband's foolish caprice. She stamped her foot at him. "I must go." There was yet time to rouse the villagers, and fetch back the fugitives from justice. Oh, what devil of stupidity had possessed her wise husband to-night? "Give me the key." She had come close to him, but she did not scream when she was angry, her voice grew low and almost hoarse, "or I will leave you forever."

He had laid aside his paper now, with quite a serious air, and Jane felt vaguely frightened; she had never seen him sober with her. Could he do any more than others when they are angry? She did not reason about it; she only began to be afraid of her own words. His was the only nature in the world could have tamed her so completely.

Every moment Philip Breton's carriage was bearing the woman Jane hated to safety and peace that her false heart had never deserved. But there were fleeter horses in Bretonville than his; they could be pursued; they could be overtaken and dragged back in greater ignominy than ever. It would be more terrible for Bertha even than if the blow had come while she sat serene in her own home. To be overtaken in flight would cap her shame. Jane threw herself into her husband's arms. She kissed his eyes, his mouth, his white neck; she covered his smooth hands with kisses; twining her arms about his neck she lavished the tenderest of carressing epithets on him. Then she drew herself away. Her black hair had been partly loosened, and as she stood hung well down her flushed cheeks. She had raised her hands and clasped them over her bosom; her lips parted; surely no human being can resist such wistful beauty as hers.

"Please let me go."

But before he could answer she heard a noise like thunder and rushed to the window. She sees nothing, but the sound comes on nearer and nearer; it comes from the hill. Something white gleams in the moonlight.

"What do you see?" asked Mr. Ellingsworth carelessly, returning to his newspaper.

She holds her breath. Nearer it comes, Philip's white horse Joe on a mad gallop. But Philip is not upon him. Who is that rider, with long, uncovered hair and pale, haggard face? He strikes the maddened animal every moment for better speed, though now they seem flying faster than the wind. The man is Curran. Let him be his own avenger, then.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE PRICE OF HAPPINESS.

The Breton carriage had passed the last house in the village, when Philip leaned out for one last look at the home of his childhood and the scene of the only work he should ever do. He was almost a boy yet; it seemed only a few days since he had looked at the great world only as a play ground. It was a short work he had done in the few days of his manhood, and even that had been condemned. Dear old mills, with their bold towers and massive walls, but his no longer. His heritage was sold, his birthright lost. He turned his eyes away; it was more than he could bear. On the hill back above the village he saw for the last time, as the road wound off toward Lockout, his house, that was. "Deserted" seemed written on its stone walls. It had never looked so noble to him, a sort of halo seemed to float above it. He could see the window of the room where he was born, but for what a worthless life.

"Good-by," he murmured. The road as it followed the winding river made another turn, and the lights of the village were shut away from his misty eyes.

The horses were trotting at their best. There was none too much time.

It was far better than he had hoped. The dangers had gathered so thickly, there had seemed at one time hardly more than a chance for escape. Peril seemed on every hand, enemies to spring from every covert, and stretch out their hands to stop the fugitives. But the village was far behind now. A few moments more and the steaming horses would draw up at the Lockout station, and they would be whirled away faster than any pursuer to peace and safety and honor.

"How odd it all is, setting out in this way as if we were eloping."

Philip was reaching forward to take her hand, but he drew back, as if he were stung. How terribly thoughtless she was.

"I explained about the steamer's early morning start."

"Do you know," resumed Bertha softly, "how pleased I am to have this trip to Europe? It is a sort of wedding journey isn't it?"

How good God had been, to let him keep the awful truth from her. It would have crushed her, the very thought of her shame. It was crushing him.

"I shall enjoy it very much," she said, putting out her hand to him, in unusual fondness. "I am afraid I haven't returned your goodness very well." No more she had

"Where shall we go first?"

"To the south of France, God willing," he added solemnly.

Bertha looked at his face with a new anxiety. The moonlight seemed to bring out all the marks of his terrible care and suffering. But he gazed at her in astonishment; he had never seen an expression so near love in her eyes for him. Was her heart softening, would she yet make up to him in her new love all that he lost for her sake? But her lips were moving.

"I shall be better with you than I used to be. I—I—" she dropped her eyes before his passionate joy, the sadness had gone in an instant from his face, his future seemed beautifully radiant again. "I feel different toward you, dear."

He bent forward to draw her to his heart. He was paid for everything. He had taught his wife to love him as he dreamed she could love. She had lifted her rapt face toward his. It had come—the moment he had given his life for. But suddenly his heart stopped beating; there was a sound of a galloping horse. Philip kissed his wife, but as solemnly as if she were dead, and put her away from him. He leaned forward and looked back over the road they had come.

He saw nothing at first, but he heard the sound of a horse's hoofs. He put his head far out. It might have been a white speck in the road, but as he looked the speck became larger and clearer. It was a white horse, at a dead run, on their course. Philip Breton's heart, that had just been almost bursting with its new happiness, was a great, cold stone in his breast. And he fancied he could escape, with enemies like his and a whole village against him. He could see only one pursuer. Ah, he knew who it must be. And that pursuer grew nearer every moment.

"Drive faster," he shouted to the coachman, "run the horses."

How like the wind his pursuer came. Philip had thought there was but one horse that could leap so mightily. Why this was that one, his own horse Joe. Why it might be a servant from his home with something that had been forgotten. It need not be the worst peril his fancy could picture! But he dared not hope.

"Isn't this delightful," exclaimed Bertha. "There can't be any danger of our missing the train at this rate."

"Whip your horses; don't spare them—faster."

If anything should break their troubles would all end that night. And the strain on the harnesses and the groaning axles was beyond all calculation of the makers. The horses, too, had got past the control of the driver. He had no more occasion to urge the wild creatures; instead, he was pulling at the reins with all his strength, but to no purpose, except so far he had kept them in the road.

The rider of the white horse was hatless, and his long, loose hair and his swinging hand, as he struck the panting white flanks of the horse, gave him an uncanny look as if there were no deed of horror too blood curdling for him to do. The horse dropped big flakes of foam from his mouth, foam mingled with blood; his eyes and nostrils were dilated with agony; his breathing was like fierce gusts of wind in a tempest. Philip Breton knew the rider as well as the horse. His pursuer was Curran; and the implacable laws made him yet the husband of the woman whom Philip Breton had made his wife.

They were almost at Lockout. The carriage gave a terrible lurch at a turn in the road. The horses were almost taken off their feet, but still there was no accident; the windows of the carriage grazed the solid wall of rock without being broken, and in a moment the horses, now subdued, were trotting down the hill toward the city.

But the fugitives had hardly escaped the cut through the rocks when the pursuer entered it. He had almost overtaken them. He struck the horse's white flanks a pitiless blow. It was at the very spot where Curran had saved Bertha's life from the mad dog, that the old horse, forced beyond his strength, stopped as if lightning had struck him. The blood welled in torrents from his mouth and nostrils; he quivered like a leaf, and then fell dead in his tracks. The rider shot over the creature's head with the gathered momentum of that mad race, and struck the jagged rock with a sickening crash.

Curran was dead.

CONCLUSION.

As the dawn broke in the east that Thursday morning, Philip Breton stood on the deck of the steamer Salvator. The look of feverish watchfulness, that had never left his face for so long, was gone at last. The great fear that had chased smiles from his lips, had given place to a great hope. A divine calm and peace had come at last upon his soul. Fate had seemed invincible. He had pitted his beautiful mills and his home and his hopes of glory against it, all for the love of a woman who had no heart for him. He had conquered, and he did not begrudge the price, this royal lover; for he had won the love of his bride at last.

Below in her stateroom, weary with her unwonted excitement, Bertha was sleeping; sleeping like a child unconscious of the terrible peril and infamy she had escaped by only so much as a hair's breadth. The hurrying ship rocked her gently in the great cradle of the deep and bore her to lands of undreamed of beauty; where the light of a new eternal love would be on everything.

THE END.

—The oldest person who has died this year, according to the longevity sharps, was Gottfried Wapmarek, who passed away in Germany not many week's ago at the undisputed age of 126 years. The oldest person of modern times whose death is recorded accurately was Louisa Truxo, an English woman, who was 175 years old when she died in 1780. There was a Don Cameron, who may have been an ancestor of the present family of long lived Camerons in Pennsylvania, who died in Scotland in 1759 at the age of 130 years.

THE CHAMBER OF TORTURE

Is the apartment to which the unhappy sufferer from inflammatory rheumatism is confined. If ere the crisis of pain is reached, that fine preventive, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, is used by persons of a rheumatic tendency, much unnecessary suffering is avoided. Nervines, anodynes and sedatives, while having none but a specific effect, are yet very desirable at times. Yet can they produce no lasting effect upon rheumatism, because they have no power to eliminate from the blood the rheumatic virus. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters does this, and checks at the outset a disease which, if allowed to gain headway, it is next to impossible to dislodge or to do more than relieve. Rheumatism, it should be remembered, is a disease with a fatal tendency from its proneness to attack the heart. A resort to the Bitters should, therefore, be prompt. Dyspepsia, kidney complaint, malaria and nervousness are relieved by it.

Pennsylvania has two Arbor days each year, one in the spring and one in the fall.

THE PEOPLE

are not slow to understand that, in order to warrant their manufacturers in guaranteeing them to benefit or cure, medicines must possess more than ordinary merit and curative properties. HAPPY RECOVERY.

There is nothing I now enjoy that I do not owe to having used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy. of Rondout, N. Y., at a time when I was suffering all that a human being could endure. My troubles began in my kidneys, from which I never expected to recover. My physicians said I had Bright's disease. Later I had a bad attack of Gravel. Six years ago last June—how well I remember that day—I saw Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy advertised in our paper. After using three bottles I was well. I have never had a return of the disease, and though I am over sixty years of age I am vigorous and strong, as I was in my prime. What physicians and the many remedies I had taken could not do Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy did; it stayed the disease and made me a well woman.—Mrs. Emiline P. Miner, Burg Hill, O.

A NEW HOME TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscope research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on application by A. H. Dixon & Son, 337 and 339 West King St., Toronto, Canada.—Scientific American.

EVERYONE SPEAKS WELL OF IT.

Rochester, N. Y., March 18, '86.

For many years I have been troubled with severe pains in the back of my head and neck, the pain being so severe at times that I was nearly insane, and my friends feared that I would be. Lumps as large as a hickory-nut, would swell up on my forehead and neck. I tried many different kinds of medicines and physicians, but none seemed to reach my case, until I commenced the use of Dr. Pardee's Rheumatic Remedy, and before I had used it four days, the pain left my neck and shoulders and went to my hips and limbs. I continued taking the remedy, and the disease seemed to work downward, but there was but little pain. I am still using the remedy, and I feel confident it will entirely cure me; for I am so much better and stronger than I have been for years. I cheerfully recommend it to all.

THE REVOLVING MULE.

JOHN PHŒNIX'S INVENTION STILL ON FILE IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

"The last time I was in Washington," said a veteran army officer to the American correspondent, "those fellows up at the navy department were in quite a huff over an effort looking to a change in their uniforms, and there was as great a commotion as the one that existed during President Pierce's administration, when they talked of changing the styles of uniforms in the army. That event was attended by some very amusing incidents, but the most laughable was the part taken in it by the late Captain Derby, or John Phœnix, as he was known in journalistic and literary circles. He was a lieutenant at the time, and stationed in California. Jeff Davis, who was secretary of war, issued a general invitation to officers of the army who were skilful draughtsmen to send in suggestions for the new uniform which it had been decided to adopt. One such invitation was sent to each officer. Lieutenant Derby was very ready with his pen—a really ingenious artist. In reply he sent to the war department, not exactly a design for a new uniform, but a peculiar addition to the old uniform, the amendment consisting merely of a ring attached to the seat of the trousers of each private soldier. Each officer was to carry, instead of a sword, a long pole with a hook in the end, like a shepherd's crook. The pole and the ring enabled officers to keep privates from running away in battle. Fugitives could be easily caught by it and brought back; stragglers could be kept in line. Moreover, the ring would be very useful in the cavalry service to fasten soldiers to the saddle, to prevent them from falling off, and in the artillery service the rings were to be used for draught purposes, in the absence of mules. These specifications were accompanied by the most grotesque pictures, representing officers hauling back cowardly recruits by the serviceable ring, cavalry securely fastened to the tops of their steeds by the same device, and artillerymen harnessed to cannon, drawing them through narrow defiles or up an acclivity inaccessible to mules. On another sheet of Bristol board was an illustration in gaudy colors of "Derby's Rotary Mule Howitzer," accompanied by a written inscription to this effect: "Upon the back of a young and vigilant mule strap a mountain howitzer, the muzzle pointing toward the tail. A small piece of ordnance is fastened with iron bands under the animal's abdomen, the muzzle aimed between his forelegs to the front. There are four gunners—two on each piece—and a 'persuader,' as he is called, whose business it is to persuade the mule to stand firm and not retreat, by stuffing him with oats, after each discharge, with a tin sausage stuffer. When Indians or other legitimate game appear in view, the mule is, by a crank movement on the tail, brought to the front. It don't make any difference which way the mule faces—and here is where my patent comes in—one gun is always pointing toward the front. At the command 'Fire!' the top howitzer is discharged. The recoil throws the mule on his back, bringing the second gun into position. This is discharged, which suddenly throws the mule on his feet again, when the gunners swab out the mule's throat with hay and reload."

The illustrations which accompanied these directions—in brown, red, blue and gold, and still on file in the war department—represented the rotary mule in seven different attitudes, looking contented and happy all the time. This was felt to be outrageous audacity on the part of a subaltern. The clerks in the war department laughed at the funny letter immoderately, but their superiors looked serious. Jefferson Davis, the secretary, was terribly indignant and he resolved to defend his wounded dignity. Charges and specifications were drawn up against Lieutenant Derby and the officers were actually named for his court-martial when William R. Marcy, secretary of state—a man of considerable sense and self-poise said to the secretary of war: "Now, see here, General Davis, don't you do it. This Derby has undoubtedly a superfluous development of humor, but he is shrewd and ingenious and really a fine draughtsman. He has valuable qualities. You can organize a court that will convict him, but you will be the butt of ridicule on account of it all your life. Better file the suggestions of the crook-and-ring and the lively rotary mule and say nothing. And he did it. Poor Derby subsequently became an inmate of an insane asylum and later died by suicide."

ARAGO'S LITTLE JOKE.

Popular Science News.

One day, at the Academy of Sciences, they had a long and tiresome session. Arago thought he would go out and take the air. At the foot of the stairway there was a leather bowl, upon which the rays of the sun were hotly beating. Arago turned the bowl round, and, rushing up stairs, told the distinguished assemblage that he had just met with something that was very mysterious. "That leather bowl," he said, "at the foot of the stairway, is cool upon the side which presents itself to the sun, but warm upon the other side." The scientists descended in a body, and substantiated this assertion. They took the inclination of the sun, the hour, the minute, the second, and a vast array of other details. They made calculations; and several weeks afterward each of them presented a paper explaining the phenomenon, Arago himself taking care to send in his explanation with the rest. There is no knowing how far the discussion might have gone, had it not been for the doorkeeper, who, having seen Arago turn the bowl, and pitying the worthy gentlemen who were so much worried, cleared away the mystery.

THE GREELY EXPEDITION.

The Facts in Regard to the Charges of Cannibalism Made in 1884.

Of the twenty-five persons composing the party of Lieutenant A. W. Greely, known as the Lady Franklin Bay Expedition, there were rescued June 22, 1884, by the relief party under Commander W. S. Schley, the following named persons: Lieutenant Greely, Sergeant Brainard, Sergeant Fredericks, Sergeant Long, Sergeant Ellison, Hospital Steward Belderbach and Private Connell. Sergeant Ellison had lost both hands and feet by frost-bite, and died July 6, three days after amputation, which had become imperative. Lieutenant Kislingbury died in June, Lieutenant Lockwood in April, and the rest of the party who succumbed to the rigors of the climate and starvation died between January 1, 1884, and the time of the rescue of the remnant. Five of the bodies of the deceased members of the expedition had been buried in the ice, but the winds and currents had swept them out to sea and they were never recovered. One of the two Esquimaux was drowned while sealing to get food for the explorers, and the other died of starvation. One of the party was shot by order of Lieutenant Greely. There were eleven bodies brought back to the United States. The remains of Lieutenant Lockwood were sent to friends at Annapolis; of Lieutenant Kislingbury to Rochester, N. Y.; of Sergeant Jewell to Kalamazoo, Mich.; of Sergeant Linn to Philadelphia; of Sergeant Ralston to Howard, Ohio; of Sergeant Ellison to Pottsville, Pa.; of Private Whistler to Delphi, Ind.; of Private Ellis, to Clyde, N. Y.; and the bodies of Privates Schneider and Henry were not claimed by any relatives or friends and were sent to Cypress Hills Cemetery for interment. These burials took place in the early part of the month of August, 1884. It was not long after their arrival and interment before a profound and painful sensation was created throughout the United States by the publication of a story to the effect that some of the survivors had practiced cannibalism. It was reported that when the remains of the dead members of the Greely expedition were found by the rescuers several of the bodies showed that the the fleshy portions had been cut away. The painful impression which these rumors made was not removed, but rather strengthened by the reticence of the survivors of the expedition, excepting Lieutenant Greely, who publicly declared that if the survivors had consumed any of the remains of the dead, he was not aware of it. So intense was the feeling thus created that the remains of Lieutenant Kislingbury were disinterred and examined by medical experts, who stated that the reports as to the removal of parts of the fleshy portions of the bodies were true. Commander Schley, in his official report, said:

"In preparing the bodies of the dead for transportation in alcohol to St. John, it was found that six of them, Lieutenant Kislingbury, Sergeants Jewell and Ralston, and Privates Whistler, Henry and Ellis had been cut, and the fleshy parts removed to a greater or less extent. All other bodies were found intact." Lieutenant Greely made a report in regard to the death of Private Henry, in which he stated that Henry had been shot by his (Greely's) orders, and after repeated demands of the men, for persistently stealing from the meager supply of provisions on which the lives of the survivors all depended. Lieutenant Greely asked that there be a court martial or court of inquiry in regard to the matter, but the Secretary of War did not deem it necessary and the matter has rested there.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

BETTER THAN QUININE.

Raw Onions as a Specific for Malaria and Kindred Diseases.

One day I was taken with chills and headache, signs that my old enemy, malaria, was on hand. My quinine box was empty, and I was looking forward to a restless, sleepless night. In desperation I peeled a raw onion and slowly ate it, and then went to bed, with warm feet and an extra comforter, when, presto! I was asleep in five minutes, and awaked in the morning free from malaria and ready for the day's duties.

Our homely but strong friend will be appreciated in time as a medicine, and if agriculturists would turn their attention to raising a model onion with the strong scent taken out that taints the breath so unpleasantly, families will be putting their "pills" in the cellar by the barrel, and the doctors would take to onion farming. The onion acts as a cathartic and diuretic, and may help to break up a cold or lessen the bad symptoms. Said a doctor: "I always store a barrel of onions in my cellar during the fall. We have them cooked twice a week, and whoever of the family is threatened with a cold eats some onion raw. If this vegetable were generally eaten, there would be no diphtheria, rheumatism, gout, kidney or stomach trouble.

"But bless you! the young men and women are afraid to eat them. One young man went so far as to say to me: 'If my wife ate onions I would get a bill of divorce.'"—American Garden.

He Was Thoughtful.

"Can you furnish bail in the sum of $200?" was asked of a prisoner in the police court the other day.

"Yes, I suppose I could, but"——

"Who will go on your bond?"

"I was going to say that the president of the United States would probably be only too glad to, but I hate to bother him with such a trifle. I'll"——

"Get some one else?"

"No, I'll go to jail. This is Mr. Harrison's busy day, and I don't want to disturb him."—Detroit Free Press.

RARE SEA-SHELLS.

SPECIMENS OF INDESCRIBABLE BEAUTY—DESCRIPTION OF THE "CHRIST SHELL."

New York News.

A reporter found the shell dealer in his office, the walls of which are lined with shelves, supporting trays containing specimens of almost every kind of deep-water shells. He said: "Yes: I know something about shells—in fact, I think I am the largest professional dealer in this country, if not in the world. I was born and brought up under the shadow of Fulton market, so to speak, and have been collecting shells since I was a boy."

He wheeled over a mahogany cabinet to where the reporter was sitting, and said:

"This is my own collection, and I do not think it can be equaled in this country. I value it professionally at $3,000; but I would not sell it. Two of my customers—one a leading Baptist clergyman in Brooklyn, and the other a wealthy widow lady who owns a great deal of real estate in this city, including two or three hotels—have fine collections; but not so complete as mine. Just look it over and judge for yourself."

The first and second drawers of the cabinet were devoted to coral specimens of every conceivable color and formation. The dealer explained that they came from the East Indies, Ceylon, Cuba, the Australasian islands, the Mediterranean, and the Pacific islands. The third drawer was filled with specimens of the conch family of beautiful form and shades, and the fourth drawer was resplendent with varieties of pearl shells. In the fifth drawer some very rare shells were seen. There were neckramoes with hazel bodies covered with dark spots and convoluted edges. They are a showy shell and are found in Ceylon. Another East Indian shell, known as "the leopard," shifts and changes its color like a monster opal when turned before the light. He produced an East Indian scallop shell which he said was the finest specimen in this country. A double rainbow was marked on its inner surface, and the blending of the colors were simply wonderful. In another drawer were sea-urchins, marling-spikes, star-fish, sea-ships or nautilus and many other curious shells. In a corner of the room, apparently neglected, were two palm baskets from the garden of Pampilnezo, island of Maricu, and brought to New York by Capt. Godwin of the brig Charlotte.

He then opened the east drawer, and taking out a blue velvet case, handed it to the reporter, saying: "That is the Christ shell."

The reporter opened the case and saw the shell, which is small of size. The back is a pale emerald green of indescribable tint, while on the white under-surface appears a perfect reproduction of the Savior's face, wearing the crown of thorns, the stigmata being distinctly marked by crimson lines. As the reporter handed him back the case in silence, the dealer said:

"It is found in the Indian Archipelago, and is extremely rare. I believe there are only four specimens in this country, mine, which you have seen; the second, owned by the Brooklyn clergyman; the third, which was purchased in Europe by Mrs. S., and the fourth, which is in the possession of Mr. Pierre Canonge, a distinguished French gentleman living in New Orleans. Mine is not for sale."

In further conversation, he explained that the fashion of collecting rare shells was on the increase, and was wholly confined to persons of refinement and taste.

COMPOSITE, OR IDEAL PORTRAITS.

A late number of Popular Science News gives an account of how Mr. Galton of the Photographic Society of Great Britain produced composite portraits by superimposing and blending a number of portraits of different individuals, thus producing an ideal likeness containing the general characteristics of the group. Mr. Galton's first method of producing composite portraits was by means of a copying camera; paper positives being used. He now, however, used transparencies, and he exhibited and described the apparatus which he had adopted for the purpose.

One purpose for which he believed composite portraits would be valuable was that of producing a standard physiognomy of disease. With this object he had taken the portraits of consumptive persons, male and female, and had combined them; and it was remarkable how a certain average of faces was found to be almost identical.

Mr. Galton also exhibited a number of what he called typical portraits. One was the face of an idealized criminal formed from a combination of seven portraits of criminals; others were the faces of consumptive patients; and a third series was that of the portraits of officers and men of the royal engineers. In one case he had combined the portraits of twelve officers; in another, the portraits of eleven privates; and in a third he had combined the portraits of officers and privates. In each instance Mr. Galton said the individuality marking each class was strongly brought out and idealized. He also pointed out how, in every case, the idealized portrait was better looking than the faces from which it was made.

THACKERAY IDEA OF DEATH.

Those who are gone from you, you have. Those who departed loving you, love you still, and you love them always. They are not really gone those dear hearts and true, they are only gone into the next room, and you will probably get up and follow them, and yonder doors will close upon you and you will be no more seen.

A DELICATE SLUR.

Leslie's Sentinel.

"Yes," said the young gentleman, "Charlie has put a slur—a delicate slur—on me." "What was it?" "Introduced me to his girl." "How's that a slur?" "Why, isn't it equivalent to saying, 'Oh, you're of no account, there's no danger of you getting me out.'"

The greatest of all politeness is to let a man act natural.

HOW WALL STREET RUMORS ARE MANUFACTURED.

New York World.

It is not, however, ordinarily very difficult to set a rumor afloat. Let a member enter the stock exchange and say that he has just heard "so-and-so," and with lightning rapidity "so-and-so" is in everybody's mouth. The messenger boys who crowd around the entrance of the exchange are sometimes employed to float a rumor on the market. The boy, while waiting for a message, reports to the member employing him the report outside. If it seems plausible the member is sure to repeat it to some one else, and thus the rumor is sent on its rounds.

One of the most persistent of rumors is the report of Vanderbilt's death or fatal illness. It is sure to turn up every two or three months. In some instances it may have a legitimate origin, as, for instance, the great capitalist may be actually indisposed, and this fact, after many repetitions, grows into a report of his death. But there is no reason to doubt that the rumor generally is started by some one who wishes to depress prices and is willing to resort to this device to effect his purpose.

One of the anecdotes of the street is of an operator on his last legs who made a desperate effort to recover himself. He hired a man to stand on the corner of Nassau and Fulton streets and quietly announce that Commodore Vanderbilt was reported dead. That was when the commodore was living. In an incredible short space of time the rumor had reached Wall street. Prices declined in consequence, but in the evening the commodore in person vigorously denounced the originator of the report.

A well concocted lie will often effect a decided change in the price of a security. The originator of a rumor that is to be effective must make it plausible, and so mix truth and fiction together that even the most astute dealers will be deceived. Hence the art of making rumors has in fact reached a high state of perfection.

There are two other classes of people on Wall street who are engaged in making rumors. First there are men called "pointers," pitiable fellows generally. They are men, perhaps, once brokers and speculators, but now reduced in circumstances and compelled to live by the sharp exercise of their wits. They coin a rumor, generally, and then endeavor to sell it as a "point." They claim to have got their information from an inside source and they magnify its importance. Then there are sharpers in the pay of unscrupulous operators, whose business it is to whisper rumors into the ears of the "lambs" to induce them to buy what the operators are secretly anxious to get rid of.

TOPSAIL HALYARDS.

J. F. Keane in "Blue Waters."

Out we lay on the quivering yard—"look out you don't get struck on the head"—for the wind is whirling hundreds of yards of wet canvas as stiff as the cover of this book, over the yard and round your head, as though it were so much of the softest silk, now snapping like a thousand coach-whips, now bellying up over your head, and flying out with a boom like a great gun, and a wrench at the great yard that makes it sway like a willow branch. Now is the time you want sailors—the skill to take advantage of the quite moment, or the flap of the canvas, that brings it into your hands; the insensibility to the danger of the situation, aloft on the dizzy, shaking yard, whizzed a hundred feet through the darkness high up over the boiling, surging waves at every roll of the ship.

A man must fight the gale in its might many and many a time before he becomes unconscious of any fear aloft at such a time. But he is no sailor unless he does so. A man who has to keep one hand for himself and one for the ship is not much good aloft on a dirty night. After an hour or so up at the mainsail we managed to get it tied up in such a fashion that it drove the mate into a towering rage. I often fancied that some of the men used to like to be stuck aloft just to keep out of his reach. I know that after coming down aloft from such a job, I used to think the mate was almost justified in his worst treatment of them. "Let go the topsail halyards," roared the mate to a man standing by them. "I ain't a touchin' em, Sir," answered the man, when a moment's delay might cost a sail or a mast. If none of them did that actual trick they often did things quite as provoking, and made one almost sympathize with the mate.

WASN'T QUITE SATISFIED.

Thad Stevens used to say that a contented farmer was a rarer creature than a white black bird. Illustrative of the assertion, he used to tell a story of a certain farmer at whose house he once visited. While strolling over the farm, Mr. Stevens observed that the farmer's corn crop, which was just ripening, was remarkable beyond anything he had ever seen. "My friend," said Mr. Stevens to the farmer, "this is truly magnificent! There is nothing left to be desired in your corn yield this year." "W-e-l-l," responded the farmer, guardedly, "it is purty fair; purty fair. But," and this with a noticeable tinge of sadness, "thar might be a few more cunnels—just a few more cunnels—at the end of the cob."

A CRITICISM OF MINISTER LOWELL.

Springfield Republican.

Minister Lowell used to talk in a straight-forward, honest American fashion, knowing what he wanted to say and saying it; but now he hums and haws like a peer at a county dinner or a lawyer in the vacation. "He was good enough to say," and "I am bound to take for granted," and "Perhaps I may be allowed to say," and "My friend, if I may be permitted to call him so," and a hundred more such circumlocutory and apologetic phrases—these make an American ear sick with a desire for a blunt word or two from "Hosea Bigelow."

From the French: When friends no longer reproach each other it is a sign that friendship has departed.

SOME FAMOUS TRAMPS.

English Men of Letters Who Were Enthusiastic Walkers.

The finest thoughts of many great thinkers are undoubtedly the more or less direct result of their communion with the out-door world, its strengthening winds and healing sunshine. Certain men of incalculable influence over ideas and morals have been constant lovers of country walks, and it would be difficult to overestimate the effect of such solitary rambles on their habits of thought.

It is calculated that Wordsworth, in his many years of sauntering, must have traveled a distance of 180,000 miles. What sights he saw during such prolonged and delightful wanderings only those who have the poet's mind and eye can even guess.

Charles Dickens was a confirmed tramp, and no doubt acquired his experience of "life on the road" from actual acquaintance with all sorts of vagabonds and odd characters, such as frequent towns and country lanes and highways.

One of the most remarkable of unprofessional walkers was Prof. Wilson, the "Christopher North" of literature. His fine physique and great endurance prompted him to the performance of wonderful feats, which seemed to him entirely a matter of course. He once walked forty miles in eight hours, and at another time walked from Liverpool to Elleray in twenty-four hours, a distance of eighty miles. It is good to think of the long, unwearied strides with which he swung along, his blood bounding with healthy pulses, and sending invigorating waves to the active brain.

Henry Fawcett, also, was a tireless walker, and one who, when deprived of sight, did not for a moment think of relinquishing this among many forms of exercise. He was a familiar figure on the roads about Cambridge, and there is no exaggeration in saying that few men blessed with all their senses could enjoy nature more thoroughly than he.

Southey, worn and preyed upon by mental application and the practical anxieties of everyday life, found his greatest relief in tramping about the country, listening for what nature had to tell him, and learning contentment from her stability. John Stuart Mill delighted in pedestrian tours, and Charles Lamb, though he loved town better than the country, was one who believed in sweeping cobwebs from the brain by brisk and continuous walking.

All these men walked not merely for profit, but for pleasure, and the profitableness of the exercise was the greater because of their pleasure in it. Their example may be commended to all. It is safe to say that whoever once forms the habit of regular tramping will never forego it except under some necessity.—Youth's Companion.

THE PRIMEVAL POTATO.

How Persecuted by Beasts and Birds, It Invented the Tuber.

In some unknown region in the new world, probably somewhere about the highlands of Peru—for the origin of the potato, like that of Jeames da la Plunche, and other important personages is "wrop in mystery" there grew, at that precise period of history known to chronologers as "once upon a time," a solanaceous plant peculiarly persecuted in the struggle for life by the persistent attention of too many hungry and herbivorous admirers. In such a case the common resource of any ordinary unscrupulous member of the solanum family would doubtless have been to adopt the usual solanaceous tactics of poisoning these its obtrusive friends and actual enemies. Any other solanum would have filled its stem and leaves with narcotic juices and made itself exceedingly bitter to the taste, so that the beasts and birds, disgusted at the first bite, would have desisted from the vain attempt to devour it. Not so the father of all potatoes. That honest and straightforward plant declined to have recourse to such mean strategy. Hard pressed by herbivores in the struggle for existence it struck out a new line for itself and for Ireland. It invented the tuber. And what is the tuber, which natural science, thus acting upon the necessities of the primeval potato, succeeded in producing for a hungry world? Essentially and fundamentally it is not, as most people imagine, a root, but an underground branch, bearing buds and undeveloped leaves on the surface, which we know as eyes, and capable of doing all the work of a branch in producing foliage, flowers and berries. All that is peculiar to the tuber, viewed as a branch, sums itself up in two cardinal points. First, it happens to develop under ground (an accident which, as we all know in the familiar cases of layers and suckers, may occur with any ordinary branch any day); and, secondly, it is large, swollen, and soft, because it contains large reserves of material, laid up by the plant in this safe retreat to aid the future growth of its stems and leaves in a second season. A tuber in fact must be regarded merely as one of the many plans adopted by plants in order to secure for themselves continuity of existence. In woody shrubs and trees the material laid up by the individual to provide for next year's leaves and flowers is stored in the inner bark, which does not die; and this accounts for the way in which such trees as almonds, mezereon and pyrus japonica are enabled to blossom in early spring before the foliage itself begins to come out.—Cornhill Magazine.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Precautions to be Used in Cases of Scarlet Fever and Diphtheria.

Scarlet fever is communicated by the minute particles of skin which flake off during the convalescing process, and there is always danger until every particle of this cuticle has been shed. Whenever scarlet fever is suspected, isolate the patient and attendant, and let there be no contact with the other members of the family until the physician has pronounced the case fully cured. Do not let even a cat or dog or bird be in the room. If it be possible let the attendant perform all the work of the sick room. Have a plentiful supply of strong solution of carbolic acid, one part pure carbolic acid and three parts water.

Keep an atomizer constantly filled with it. If a carpet be on the floor of the sick room, let it be sprinkled frequently with the carbolic acid, also the bed coverings, the dress of the attendant, the walls and every article of furniture. Let no dishes or trays leave the room until they have been brought under the carbolic spray. All articles to be washed should be laid in water to which the carbolic solution has been added before they are given to the laundress, and they should be washed alone. After attending to the patient the hands should be washed in carbolic water, and the clothing of the physician should be sprinkled before he leaves the room, the spray from the atomizer being so fine it will not injure any fabric or cause any inconvenience. When the patient leaves the room have every thing that can be washed thoroughly cleaned with the carbolic solution; then fumigate closets and wardrobes and the room or rooms with roll brimstone.

Every window must be made air-tight and keyholes stopped with cotton. Two pounds of sulphur (roll) will be sufficient for a large room and a small quantity for a closet or a wardrobe. All jewelry and metal ornaments should be removed before the fumigation is begun, as the fumes of sulphur oxidize metals. Place the sulphur in a flower-pot saucer, which may be set upon a brick to prevent any danger from fire. Open all bureau drawers, all books and boxes, and take the mattresses from the bedstead, so the sulphur fumes may permeate every thing in the room. Leave the room unopened for three or four days, and then air thoroughly. Too great care can not be exercised in the fumigation. The germs of scarlet fever are carried in books, toys, garments and by animals. In short, every thing upon which a bit of scarfskin can rest is a vehicle for the transmission of the disease. I know of a case in which scarlet fever was communicated by a book which had been in an infected room, and had not been fumigated. The child who brought the book home was attacked by the fever in a severe form. He underwent an isolation of six weeks, during which time the only communication that the mother, who was his nurse, had with the rest of the family was through a window, the person who came to converse or receive orders being first well sprinkled with carbolic acid as well as the mother.

None of the other members of the family contracted the disease. Years ago, before carbolic acid was discovered, and before so great precautions were taken, a celebrated physician had his two children ill with scarlet fever. The toys with which they played were put away unfumigated. Five years later these toys were taken from the closet in which they had remained and were given to two children who had come to visit at the house. These children were attacked with scarlet fever, although there were no cases in the physician's practice nor in that of his colleagues. The cause of the infection was then suspected, and the toys promptly burned. This illustrates the length of time the germ remains virulent. In diphtheria the same rules are to be observed. It is a safeguard to place carbolic acid in vessels about the halls through which the attendant has to pass, thereby greatly lessening the chances of contagion. Above all things attend carefully to the directions of the physician. Write down all that he orders, so that there can be no mistake. In severe cases, where there is no trained nurse, keep a record of the changes so that the doctor may know what has taken place during his absence.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

War on Short Trousers.

"I am down on the mothers who persist in rearing their boys in short trousers, and I have been making a war on them—the trousers, not the mothers. We employ a large number of messengers in our office. One of the new arrivals came down with his knee breeches and I asked him if he had any others. He said he hadn't. I told him to go home and tell his mother that he couldn't have the job unless she put him in long trousers. I saw nothing of him for several days. Then he came in with a smile all over his face and he said in a boy's triumphant way: 'I got 'em. Mother didn't want to get 'em but I told her it was long trousers or no work, and then she got 'em. I'm much obliged to you for gettin' me into 'em. Hadn't been for you I'd a never had 'em.' It is my observation that as long as you keep a boy in short trousers he grows up with a sort of notion that some mistake was made in his sex and he appears to resent it by not being worth a continental."—A Business Man, in Chicago Tribune.

HOW A RAILROAD PRESIDENT CAN OPERATE IN STOCKS.

New York World.

A prominent banker last week, speaking of the Denver & Rio Grande railroad and the efforts of the directors to find a suitable man for president to succeed Gen. Palmer, said that it spoke pretty well for Wall street morals when so many had declined a position worth $75,000 a year—$25,000 in salary and $50,000 in "perquisites."

"Perquisites?" repeated the reporter, "what do you mean by that?"

"Well, I mean that the president of the Denver & Rio Grande can by virtue of his position make $50,000 in addition to his salary. And he can do this by methods that are considered legitimate. At any rate there are very few men who would not employ them. Of course the $50,000 is made by dealing in the stock of the road. The president is in a position to do this safely. Like the keeper of a faro-bank, all the chances are in his favor. He has the advantage of knowing the exact condition of the road, and of what changes are to be made in its management. Suppose, for instance, he sees a large block of "short." All that he has to do is to casually remark to some friend who would be likely to repeat it that the company might be compelled shortly to make a new issue of bonds. In a few hours this information is in the possession of the entire street and the stock declines several points, when the president covers at a handsome profit. About this time a newspaper man calls on the president and inquires concerning the reported new issue of bonds. The president denies that any such issue is contemplated and indignantly attributes the rumor to some stock-jobber who desired to raid the stock of this company. Half the rumors on the street are started in some such way as this. Don't you believe it? Well, I tell you it is true. It is this opportunity for gain which makes the presidency of a road whose securities are actively dealt in so much coveted. This has been done so much by the officers of certain roads as to bring the stock into disrepute.

A PLEA FOR THE SICK HEADACHE.

Inter Ocean.

As there are drinks which exhilirate but do not inebriate, so this disease sickens but never kills. No obituary notice ever contains the statement, "Sick headache at last proved fatal." It never does. On the contrary, if long life is a great boon, happy the man and thrice happy the woman whose malady takes the form of sick headaches. It is a way some human systems have of righting themselves up. So far from indicating a week digestion, the headache is an evidence that the digestive organs are in fighting trim. Instead of meekly submitting to abuse, the digestion rises in rebellion. Arrows of paignant pain are shot into the brain, and made to signal the will that reform is necessary. Indulgence in food which cannot be digested without a struggle is always bad. The deluded mortal who flatters himself that he is in luck because he is not promptly punished for indiscrete eating is treasuring up for himself wrath against what may prove a fatal day of vengeance, while the victim of sick headaches pays as he goes. No long score is being run up to throw him into bankruptcy some fine day. He suffers the pangs of a sick headache for a few hours, and then all is over and gone. The obligation is discharged. Dame Nature says in effect, wipe off the slate and make no entry in the ledger of life. Is this not better than to have the whole reckoning precipitated upon the poor mortal at one time?

THE IDEAL DEATH.

New York Sun.

"The ideal death," said a physician in charge of the New York city hospitals to a reporter, "was that of my uncle. He was a hale, hearty man of 80, a bachelor, wealthy, and surrounded with every comfort in a beautiful home not far from New York. He had traveled in Europe, and was full of anecdote and memory of his long life. He arose one morning apparently in perfect health. His buoyancy of spirits was noticed. He was singing some of the quaint old Scotch songs of his boyhood. He expected a visit from me, and, as he desired to confer with me on a matter of business, he arose from the table after a hasty and partial meal, saying he would drive down to the depot, not far away, and bring me to the house. He had the servant bring his ponies to the door, and refused to let the man go with him, saying he preferred to drive himself. He mounted the box and drove off at a smart pace. The old gentleman had not driven more than a few rods from his own house when he was met by a neighbor, who noticed something strange in his appearance. His horses stopped. The neighbor dismounted and went to the side of his carriage and spoke to him. The old gentleman did not answer. He sat upright in his seat, holding the reins in his hand. He was dead. He had passed away without a shock of any kind. There was no apparent cause for his death, which was probably occasioned by heart disease."

THE LOVE OF OFFICIAL LACE.

French Paper.

At one of those governmental changes which are so frequent in South America the new president sends for an artist and asks him to design some official uniforms.

"I want something brilliant," he said; "the people like that. Just look here, I have myself sketched out some ideas, and you can work according to them."

The artist looks at the presidential album.

"Yes, I see. Here is the navy and here is the administration. And these large boots with amaranth tops and this superb feather, for whom is all this?"

"That is the uniform of the secret police!"

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10.....1890

In the olden time some men got rich by having armed men in their employ and robbing their neighbors boldly. Then robbers had a rough sense of honor; they would resent an insult and die fighting bravely. Now great fortunes are acquired by bankruptcies; by unbounded lying; by chicanery and by getting corners on food and other necessaries of life. There is more outward polish now than in the olden time, but it is doubtful if there is as much real manliness and nobility of character among the modern rich as among the ruder but bolder and braver robber chiefs of the middle ages. Certainly in any of the modern manufacturing or commercial towns there is poverty, hunger and dirt, ignorance, vice and crime, as deplorable as ever existed in the worst period of the Dark Ages. Human learning, wealth, external polish and refinement, all these fail utterly to cure the human heart of selfishness, cruelty, rapacity, and indifference to the sufferings of their fellow creatures. On the contrary, great success in acquiring riches and distinction in society often only causes hardness of heart. Without the influence of the Spirit of God the human heart becomes a hell where every fiendish passion rages. The elevation of the whole human race to the highest condition mortal beings are capable of attaining is possible only by every human heart being filled with the love of God.

The Chinese are rapidly learning the use of machinery and methods of manufacture employed in Europe and the United States. With free trade to help them the people of China could glut every market in the world with manufactured goods at such prices as would force the working people of other countries to sink to Chinese modes of living or to quit work entirely and starve outright. Free trade economists admit the ability of the Chinese to supply the demand of the world with all kinds of manufactures when they shall become familiar with the use of the machinery. They also admit the consequences to the working people of other nations of giving them no protection against the importation of Chinese manufactures. And yet in the face of these admissions free trade economists urge that protection to home interests should be abolished. In self preservation the people of other nations will sooner or later be forced to establish the same rigid exclusion against the Chinese that they so long maintained against other nations. The United States is the first country to be invaded by the Chinese; it must also be the first to preserve itself from destruction by the pests.

It is alleged that a great race in railroad building is going on between the Union Pacific and the Denver and Rio Grande railroads. Each road is anxious to reach the Pacific Ocean before the other. Shrewd men believe that a great era of railroad building is about to open in China and Japan. This will demand a vast amount of iron and other supplies. Utah has immense coal fields that will supply cheap and good fuel. In Nevada and Utah are vast deposits of excellent iron ore. At some point on the coast of Southern California it is expected that great smelting works, rolling mills, machine shops and foundries will be erected and the coal and iron ore be carried there and manufactured. The facilities for shipping to China and Japan would be so much in favor of works located on the Pacific Coast that European works could not compete with ours. The vast business in prospect is given as the reason why both of the roads named above are so eager to reach tide-water and secure the best locations. If these views prove to be correct there will be a vast and very rapid increase of population in Southern California. Owens Valley would then of necessity be one of the chief sources from which a great population must be fed.

At a recent meeting of the Chamber of Commerce at Los Angeles a motion was adopted that the Committee on Legislation be requested to draw up a bill giving cities the right to vote subsidies to railroad companies. The people of Los Angeles want to give aid for building railroads to their city, but have no power to do this in their corporate capacity. They will ask the next Legislature to give them the necessary power so that subsidies may be granted to help build railroads.

PENSEE.

In man the memory is a kind of looking glass, which, having received the images of surrounding objects, is touched with life and disposes them in a new order.

EMERSON.

During a recent visit a close acquaintance was formed with a man who has made a success of life. His manner is characterized by a clear, open expression, and his hand-clasp thrills the heart. In a conversation by his fireside he spoke as follows:

"I have a haunting fancy, a dim remembrance, of a weirdly beautiful tale read in early youth. Perhaps could I read it now the story would be insipid, but read in the first glow of youthful romance its sweet prose poetry produced a lasting impression. There remains but a vague recollection of the plot and subject matter, but the main incidents are vivid and surrounded by that hallow of romance which a morbid nature will throw around all matters of the heart.

"When thoroughly aroused and striving to recall the tale in full the depicted scenes elude my mental grasp "like ghosts, dim-beckoning through the shade." There are times, however, when I lose all consciousness of outward, worldly affairs, and live only in the solemn shades and glinting, fairy moonlight that the writer could have borrowed only from Irving's "Alhambra."

"A considerable time had elapsed since I last thought of the story. My days were filled with striving for material things and my nights with thoughts of the morrow. One life seemed too short to accomplish the ambitious projects I had in view. The objects I most tried to win turned to Dead Sea fruit when grasped. The hollowness and mockery of human life became bitterly impressed upon me. Sleep fled in affright at the myriad of distorted, miss-shapen, ghoulish, goblin forms that ever danced before my eyes. At times a vision of alluring sweetness appeared, but when I would grasp it a most malicious change would come over the ethereal features and the dream being would flee with a shriek of fiendish laughter. Those whom most I trusted were proven the veriest disciples of Judas. The forced conviction that my enemies were my best friends—because I trusted them not and was continually on my guard against them—could not fail to create an appreciation of the bitterness of Byron and Pope; the raillery and skepticism of Montaigne; the contempt of Rabelais and Mirabeau. Perhaps had I been more matured what produced morbid sensitiveness and gloom in the youth would have caused pity and benevolence toward humanity in riper years.

"One night, weary and sick at heart, I entered my room. The light of the glorious harvest moon was streaming through the casement, the lace curtains of the window throwing the most fantastic and mystical tracery on the carpet. The air was oppressive with the odor of orange blossoms and mignonette. I drew a large bear-skin rug, a relic of the chase, to where I might lie bathed in the radiant flood. I lay in a dreamy, half-unconscious state, when some freak of memory brought to my mind that sweet, tender romance and I was wafted on unseen wings to the scenes described. The great unselfishness of the characters I was among impressed me deeply. Their entire devotion to each other—Paul and Virginia were not truer. The sweet simplicity of their love, and entire faith. There was spoken no articulated word. Their love vows were breathed in minor melody, a sound so weirdly sweet, so unutterably sad, that my heart seemed to stop its beating to listen. A great love is but the exponent of, and most closely allied to, the keenest pain. Through his great love for humanity Christ suffered the most terrible anguish of mind and body of which a being endowed with human attributes is capable. "He that has never suffered can never have thought or felt." The conviction insensibly came to me that if such THOUGHTS of purity and love may pervade and emanate from the mind they may be enacted in real life. The idea was a revelation. I realized that in the great human drama there are no spectators. We each must play a part, though the role is left to our own selection. We may be viewed by others through the distorting glasses of Addison but the innate consciousness of our own acts will remain with us. Until Charon ferries us to that dim beyond we may be faithful in the little things that make the tempestuous whole of life."

Hon. Thomas J. Clunie, the only Democratic Congressman from California, in a letter to the Sacramento Bee, says: "Heretofore California, while it is the grandest State in the Union, has always been entirely ignored in the way of appropriations. We have a delegation in Congress now who are for the State first and their party afterward, and we hope, as a result of pulling together, that we will get our share of the surplus." This testimony to the unpartizan spirit of his Republican colleagues does as much honor to Mr. Clunie as to them.

Congress met again last Tuesday after a recess of two weeks. Senator Cullom of Illinois offered a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to loan money to farmers at two per cent. per annum. This bill was introduced by request and Senator Cullom is not responsible for it.

Last week Jasper Howell got judgment against the heirs and assigns of the estate of Remi Nadeau for the sum of $236,000 on a suit to foreclose a mortgage on the Nadeau hotel at Los Angeles.

GOURMETS.

The Varieties of Opinion as to the Dishes That Are Toothsome.

The story of Paganini and the turkey was particularly good; but here is one about Brillat-Savarin, which I think is better; B. S. was a fugitive in this country three years from the reign of terror in France; he was a fine writer and better cook. "I was on a journey from Paris to Lyons once," he writes, "when I stopped at Sens for dinner. I was as rabid for food as a wolf—and you may imagine my feelings when, on my asking the host what there was in his larder, he answered: 'Little enough.' 'Let's see about that,' said I, as I went on to where I perceived spits perfuming the air. What do you think I saw there? Four fat turkeys—actually four—browning to a turn! 'Why,' said I, 'they're good enough for me—one of 'em, in fact!' But the host said, No! They were all bespoke by a gentleman up stairs. Perdi! thought I; this gentleman up stairs must be a second Gargantus! I will go up and entreat him for a bird. And I went. And what think you I found? Who was the glutton but my own son! 'Father,' said he, 'at home you always devour the pope's nose, the choicest tid bit of all the king of bird's anatomy. I never got one. I was determined that I would have a feast for once, so I ordered four turkeys! Now, as I only want my choice morsel you may have the rest of 'em with pleasure.'"

One of the maxims of Hemion de Ponsey, the greatest magistrate France ever had, was that the man who discovered a new dish is of more importance than the astronomer who discovered a new planet, for the reason that we have planets enough for all practical purposes, while the palate of civilized man is always yearning for the things that make life endurable. Vatel, the maitre d'hotel of Conde, was the greatest cook that ever donned a chef's cap. His suicide, because of the non-arrival of some fish to complete a great supper he was preparing, is charmingly told by Mme. de Sevigne; next to Vatel was Careme, whose memoirs have lately been published. Vatel was born in Rouen, in Normandy, as were also Bechamel, Robert and Merilion, whose fame as masters of the culinary art is historical.

A genuine epicure has some peculiar fancy of his own as regards cooking. Sam Ward in his day was the model diner out, and he had his Maryland hams boiled with straw around them. An Episcopal clergyman in Poughkeepsie prefers them boiled in wine. Judge Henry Allen considered a mongrel goose the greatest thing in the eating line, and Congressman Scott, of Pennsylvania, always wants to cook his oysters himself. Secretary Bayard is also a fine cook, and, in fact, a great many statesmen can prepare certain dishes. Dinners in Washington are generally delightful affairs, as the public men give much attention to them, and most of the diplomats are good talkers. The first maxim of the diplomats is to keep a good table and cultivate the ladies.

Here in the United States our choice is oysters, terrapin, canvas back duck and turkey. A Greenlander's great luxury is a half putrid whale's tail or a walrus liver; and a trapper in the far north has for a relish beaver tail and bear's paw. They eat their rum and chew their brandy, as everything freezes, and an arctic sandwich is a frozen slice of whisky between two slices of beer. Porpoise meat was once a favored dish with the English nobility, but now "there's no hale like the Hinglish hale, and no beef like the Hinglish beef." A delicious morsel to the Australian is kangaroo and the wild dingo. The Ottomacs in South America eat clay as a luxury, but with some people (even in our own southern states) it is a necessity. Baked elephant's trunk, palm worms fried in their own fat, roasted spiders and mice are the favorite dainties with the tribes of Africa; and the nations of the West Indies can abide anything but a rabbit stew. In China the diet is sharks' fins, bird's nest soup, ducks' tongues and the chrysalis of the silk worm after the silk has been wound from it. And so on throughout the entire world, each nation having its particular specialties.—Hartford Times.

A VOICE from Ohio. Here is a portrait of Mr. Garrison, of Salem, Ohio. He writes: "Was at work on a farm for $20 a month; I now have an agency for E. C. Allen & Co's albums and publications and often make $20 a day." (Signed) W. H. GARRISON.

William Kline, Harrisburg, Pa., writes: "I have never known anything to sell like your album. Yesterday I took orders enough to pay me over $25." W. J. Elmore, Bangor, Me., writes: "I take an order for your album at almost every house I visit. My profit is often as much as $25 for a single day's work." Mary A. Malone vs. Frank Malone—Clerk's entry of Defendant's default.

THURSDAY, January 9.

Mary A. Malone vs. Frank Malone—Divorce granted Plaintiff.

Al. Staudinger has been in town several days.

"La grippe" is having a gay and festive time at Independence.

The town of Wardner, Idaho, was wiped out by fire last Saturday.

Mr. Robert O'Neal, of Bishop, was in town a few days this week.

S. P. Smith, of Bishop, and Fred Holbert got back from Bakersfield last evening.

Henry Rhine left town last Tuesday for a vacation of a few weeks at San Francisco.

Dr. S. A. Chapman, the dentist, is again at the Independence Hotel for a few days.

Mr. Thomas C. Hill came down from Big Pine yesterday with a load of butter and eggs.

A. P. Bradford was at Independence last Tuesday. He is from San Francisco and has land located near Bishop.

Miss Katie Hardy came down from Laws at the end of last week and is on a visit with her aunt, Mrs. Lawrence.

Any person wishing to go to Mojave within ten days please communicate with this office.

There was a little snow at Bishop last Monday; enough for the boys to get out their sleighs but the sleighing was not very good.

A million voters engaged in farming in Nevada would secure more consideration for silver in Washington than one Congressman from that State on the Committee of Finance.

Heavy snow storms are reported from all the region east of the Sierra Nevadas in this State and in Nevada. The Times reports more and better sleighing than ever before known in Dayton.

Americans can no longer lay claim to having the largest fresh water lake in the world. That distinction belongs to Africa; the lake now called Victoria is admitted to be larger than Lake Superior.

It may reconcile victims of "la grippe," the new name for influenza, to know that just one hundred years ago Washington had so severe an attack of it that physicians thought his life was in danger.

O. H. Hampton passed through town this morning with an eight horse team bound to Mojave for freight. He took out grain for Lone Pine from Bishop and his return cargo will be for the latter place.

The snow blockade on the Central Pacific during the recent storm was the heaviest since the road was built. The new rotary snow plow cleared several miles of track in one day that was covered with snow to a depth of fifteen feet.

Hon. P. Reddy has been appointed by Governor Waterman a member of the State Board of Prison Directors, vice E. J. Shattuck, term expired. This is a very important position and the appointment adds to the Board plenty of ability and energy.

A correspondent writing at Reno last Monday says: "Thermometer 12° below zero here. The air full of floating frost. Landscape one vast sheet of snow. At Truckee snow five feet deep, thermometer 38° below zero. At Summit snow 25 feet deep."

Great damage was done to the railroad bridges in Los Angeles county by the recent heavy rain storms. It will cost a great deal of money to repair the loss sustained. The Tribune reports that the rainfall was one and one-half times the amount of the average rainfall for the entire season.

Several mine locations have been made in Saline Valley since the year began. Claims that had been located and a good deal of work done upon them years ago, have been relocated. The near prospect of better facilities for getting ore out of the valley has encouraged prospectors to make these locations.

Last Friday evening a snow slide at Sierra City, in Sierra county, destroyed several residences and killed the inhabitants. The slide started on Sierra Butte and swept down into the town. The Catholic Church was destroyed and several dwellings whose inmates were warned in time and escaped.

Joe Casey shot and killed Dan. Matheson at Williams, Colusa county, on January 1st. The men were in a saloon playing a game of whist and it alleged that the killing was without provocation. Casey is a son of James P. Casey, who was hanged by the Vigilance Committee at San Francisco in 1856.

Little Willie Chalfant got some new toys on the Christmas tree. His manipulation of the playthings is too 'cute for anything. The engraving of himself and papa is really quite life-like, though perhaps the ears are a trifle large. His friends are anxious, however, as the effort may be attended with serious consequences in the swelled condition of his head.

BORAX.

There is quite a rush of locators to Saline Valley, locating borax claims. A good deal of claim jumping has already been done, resulting in some confusion. The various locators appear to be making an amicable arrangement of their rival claims, and no serious trouble is apprehended. Mr. J. H. Roberts, an expert in the borax business, is reported to have located for himself and partners between five and six thousand acres in the borax swamp. It is not likely that all of this shall prove to be rich in borax but Mr. Roberts has gone over the ground carefully and has doubtless selected as good locations as exist there.

Mike Bush and a man named Kotch, from Nevada, have made some locations that are said to be good. A man known as Dutch John, of Bishop, is reported to be another of the lucky locators.

Conn & Trudo are the only parties yet taking out borax. Their ground is so rich that one man takes out enough crude to keep the works fully supplied and running to their present capacity and has plenty of time to spare. The expert employed by William T. Coleman & Co. for many years was at the camp of Conn & Trudo a few days ago and looked carefully over their ground. He says there is no doubt that they have a rich borax deposit and a valuable property. The unusually heavy snow on the Inyo mountains has made it hard on prospectors in Saline Valley. The road to Big Pine was closed against teams by snow and supplies of all kinds are reported short in the valley. From Waucoba to the summit of the Inyos, a distance of twenty-five miles, the snow lies too deep for teams to travel. Conn & Trudo have an open road from their camp to Cerro Gordo, a distance of about fifteen miles, and can get all the supplies needed over that route. But all their borax must come out by way of Big Pine Pass, therefore none can be shipped until the road shall be opened. This obstruction will be of very short duration as the snow is not very deep and will quickly go off.

Fair Director's Meeting.

The Directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association met at Independence last Saturday.

Nathan Rhine and C. A. Walter presented their credentials and were received as Directors, they having succeeded John Shepherd and W. K. Miller, whose terms had expired.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved.

N. Rhine offered a motion that a committee be appointed to examine the reports of the Secretary and Treasurer.

John S. Gorman offered an amendment that a committee be appointed to examine all accounts of the Association from its organization till date. The amendment was accepted and the motion adopted. The following were appointed: Finley McIver, A. W. Eibeshutz and E. Robinson.

A. R. Conklin offered a resolution to amend the constitution of the Association by striking out from Sec. 10 the words "At the town of Independence." The resolution was adopted by the following vote: Ayes—A. R. Conklin, John S. Gorman, Finley McIver, E. Robinson, A. W. Eibeshutz, W. S. Enos. Noes—N. Rhine, C. A. Walter.

A. R. Conklin offered a resolution that a committee of three be appointed to negociate with the Eastern Slope Stock Association, the Agricultural Association and the citizens of Bishop with a view to making arrangement for holding the next annual fair of the 18th District at Bishop, and every year thereafter alternately at Bishop and Independence. N. Rhine offered to amend the resolution by striking out the word "next." The amendment was lost by the following vote: Ayes—N. Rhine, C. A. Walter. Noes—A. R. Conklin, John S. Gorman, E. Robinson, Finley McIver, W. S. Enos. Not voting—A. W. Eibeshutz. The original resolution was carried by the following vote: Ayes—A. R. Conklin, J. S. Gorman, W. S. Enos, E. Robinson, F. McIver, A. W. Eibeshutz. Noes—C. A. Walter, N. Rhine.

The following were appointed a committee as provided in the resolution: Finley McIver, J. S. Gorman, W. S. Enos.

Director Rhine discussed the question of preferred creditors of the Association. The matter was referred to the committee appointed to examine the accounts of the Association.

The Board adjourned till Saturday, February 1st, with instructions to the committee on accounts to report at that time.

County Bonds.

For some time past negociations have been in progress on the subject of refunding the County Bonds. Last Wednesday evening the Supervisors met in special session to take further action in the matter. County Clerk Mack laid before the Board his correspondence with the Secretary of State. Secretary Hendricks says the State Board of Examiners, after due consideration, have agreed to take the bonds at five per cent. per annum. The whole amount is about $72,000; but it is not certain that the whole can be given to the State as some of the bond-holders may prefer to hold what they have got by refunding at five per cent. and the law gives them that option. But in any event it is now certain that the bonds will be refunded at the lower rate. This gives the further assurance that our rate of taxation will not be any greater than at present, and next year there may be a further reduction of taxes. The present bonds were made to run twenty years; six years have already elapsed, and without refunding the whole amount must be paid within the next fourteen years. Six thousand dollars of the principal would had to have been paid the present year and this could not be done without an increase of taxation. The new bonds will also run twenty years, saving us six years in time and at least $16,000 in interest. County Clerk Mack must go to Sacramento to complete the transaction, which he expects to do early next month.

Inyo Academy.

The winter term of the Inyo Academy at Bishop began last Monday and will continue twelve weeks. The Spring term will commence on April 7th. The Academy has added to its teaching force and is now able to give the best of accommodations in preparatory and collegiate courses of study. Rooms and board in the institution will be furnished at actual cost. During the fall term the cost was as low as $3.25 per week. For further information address Rev. G. W. De La Matyr, or W. G. Dixon, the Principal.

A Valuable Acquisition.

Mr. S. P. Smith has brought from Bakersfield a three-year-old trotting stallion he bought there. This is a fine horse and comes from the best blood. His grandsire was Electioneer and his dam of pure Bashaw breed. The horse is named Antare; he is a dark bay of fine form and without a flaw. He will be a valuable addition to the stock of the valley. Anteeo, Antevolo and Anteros were bred by Joe Cairn Simpson. Anteeo has a record of 2:16¼ and Antevolo a record of 2:18½. Both are full brothers to Anteros, the sire of Mr. Smith's colt, the three being by Electioneer, dam Columbine.

Land Contest.

The Officers of the Independence Land Office were engaged some days this week in taking testimony in a land contest wherein Charles Collins contested the pre-emption entry of Mrs. Malone. It is alleged that after making entry Mrs. Malone did not go upon the place to live till more than a year had elapsed. Prior to her going upon the place to live Collins filed a desert location upon the tract and this is the ground of contest. P. W. Forbes is attorney for Collins and Geo. M. Gill for Mrs. Malone.

TO MY MOTHER.

As the still prayers that never move the lips,
but flow to God
Through those invisible channels that we know not of,
Rise sweeter, purer, holier than the idle words
It is within the power of tongue to speak,
So of the unsung songs—the melodies that lie
Deep-buried in the soul, too closely intertwined
With its soul-life to leave it—these are the songs
Which stir the heart far deeper than the hollow words
It falls within the gift of hand to trace.

I have no power to sing to thee the sweet thought melodies
Which flow, like heavenly music, through my soul to-night—
Songs of the good thou hast wrought in my poor nature;
Songs of the love I bear for thy dear, tender heart.
I lift my pen, but as the low winds sink to rest
Far down the mountain side, among the deep night shadows,
So sink my thoughts in the deep shades of my mortality.
When God's eternal morning breaks, and we shall stand together,
Freed from the bonds of Earth, then shalt thou hear the melodies
Which stir, like breath of Heaven, in my soul to-night.

OUR GIRLS.

They Were Only Girls, But They Achieved Success.

"A fine place you've got here, Desmond," said Major Clippett, looking around with approving eyes upon the lovely lawn, spotted with leafy walnut trees. Up on the hillside the haymakers were at work; down in the valley one could just catch a glimpse of a river that wound in and out among the green copses and level pasture lands.

"Yes," said Mr. Desmond, who, stretched out upon a bamboo reclining chair, was smoking an Eastern chiboque. "It is rather pretty for a man who can't afford a villa on Lake Como!"

"I saw two young gypsies as I came up the hill," added the Major, cheerily. "They were good enough to direct me, or I might have taken the wrong path. One of them was riding a bare-back colt in the pasture, the other was doing battle with a blackberry hedge and had a very pretty mouth all besmeared with stains."

Mr. Desmond shrugged his shoulders.

"Our girls," said he. "You needn't go on to describe them any further, Clippett. Every body around here knows—our girls!"

"The poor girls," said Mrs. Desmond, who sat by, in pale blue muslin, and eyes to match. "They are a great disappointment to my husband."

"Indeed?" uttered Major Clippett, sympathetically. "They seem to be nice young things."

"Nice enough," said Mr. Desmond, apathetically. "But girls! And I've always so longed for a boy. Some one for whom you can chalk out a career; some one who can make a name in the world. Girls!"

Mrs. Desmond, who believed implicitly in her husband, drew a funereal sigh; Major Clippett laughed. And Ella and Essie, who had heard it all in the shades of the drawing-room curtains, looked sorrowfully at each other. Essie, the youngest and rosiest, had washed the blackberry stains away from her cherry lips; Ella, the tall girl, who was a very Rosa Bonheur in respect to colts and cows and all the barnyard animals, had put on her white dress and pink ribbons to do fitting honor to her father's guest. And here they stood looking sadly into each other's eyes. Side by side "our girls" went noiselessly up into the old nursery, where they had played as children.

"I always knew that papa wasn't quite suited with us," said Essie.

"But I never guessed the reason why!" said Ella.

"What shall we do?" said Essie.

"What can we do?" pleaded Ella. "We are only girls!"

"Yes, I know," said brave little Essie, who from the threshold of her fourteenth year was beginning to take shy peeps out into the world. "But things are not as they used to be, Ella! If we could only make papa say: 'I am proud of you!' If we could only induce him to look at us as if we weren't superfluities in the world!"

"Do you think it is possible?" said Ella, with brightening eyes and carmine spots glowing on each cheek.

"We can try," said Essie. "Let us go down by the river and talk about it!"

"What!" said Mr. Desmond, lifting his head wearily from the pillow of the sofa, where he was composing himself for his afternoon siesta. "Our girls again? Can they never be contented? Aren't they getting along well enough with their governess?"

"Yes, I know, dear," said little Mrs. Desmond, meekly. "But they want wider advantages than Miss Millson can give them. They want music lessons from Salvini; and a course of French and German at the Conservatoire; and Major Clippett says that his sister will be delighted to receive them for a year or two, if you don't object!"

"Object!" repeated Mr. Desmond, drowsily. "Oh, I don't object! Let them do as they please!"

And Mrs. Desmond carried this verdict to the girls.

"Didn't he say he should miss us?" said Essie, wistfully.

"Was he glad that we had some ambition?" asked Ella, whose hungry little soul yearned for sympathy as a desert wanderer sighs for a cooling fountain in the arid sands.

"No, children," said Mrs. Desmond, pityingly. "You know papa never can be very enthusiastic about girls! But—I—I dare say he will miss you when you are away."

So the two girls left Desmond Court, dismissed by their father with cold kisses, like the touch of a fish.

Five years had passed away, and "our girls" had not returned to the parent nest. Mrs. Desmond grieved for them, but her husband scarcely seemed to miss the sound of their laughter in the dim old garden alleys, or the echo of their light footsteps in the halls.

"If they had been boys, now," said he, "it would have been very different."

Until at length he went up to town to visit his friend Major Clippett.

"The girls aren't here, eh?" said he. "Well," with a yawn, "I thought you'd get tired of them."

"Not in the least," said the Major, briskly. "But in the prosecution of their life studies they have been obliged to leave us. You shall see them in a day or two."

"Plenty of time; plenty of time," said Mr. Desmond.

"Well," said the Major, "how shall we amuse ourselves? Shall we go to the theater to-night and see the beautiful young 'Ophelia,' over whom the whole world is raving?"

Mr. Desmond brightened up at once.

"Yes," said he; "let us go. I do like good acting. I think I should have made an actor myself if I had ever had a chance to 'train' properly."

"And in the meantime," said the Major, with great gravity, "we will visit the studio of a pretty artist friend of mine, who is winning herself a great name in the world."

"I'm a little rusty about art," said Mr. Desmond, "but I know a good picture when I see it."

It was a large octagonal room, lighted by a dome of ground glass from above, and hung with folds of claret-colored cloth—a room filled with glowing landscapes, fair, serious heads, and studies of the antique. Visitors moved quietly about, speaking in whispers and glancing now and again at a tall, slight girl in a brown holland dress belted at the waist, who was working at an easel at the end of the room.

"Let me introduce you to my friend the artist," said Major Clippett. Mr. Desmond bowed low.

"I reverence art in all its shapes," said he. "And if I had been fortunate to have a son—"

"Papa!" cried the girl, passionately, flinging aside her palette, "don't you know me?"

"Essie!" he cried. "No—it is not possible!"

"But it is, papa," cried she, "your little Essie!"

His eyes filled with tears, and for the first time in her life Esther Desmond saw shining in them the light of true affection.

"My girl," said he, huskily, "I am proud of you. I honor you for making a career for yourself. And Ella?"

"Oh," said Essie, busy with her colors, "you shall see her by and by."

"She is not at home, then?"

"She is not here, papa."

Mr. Desmond accompanied his wife and daughter and Major Clippett to the theater that night. It was crowded from pit to dome, for the "Ophelia" of the season had been a brilliant success; and when she glided on the stage in her pure white dress and girdle of dead gold the house rang with applause. Her face and figure were exquisite; her acting such as Shakespeare himself might have dreamed of; and when at last the curtain fell, and "Ophelia" was called out again and again to receive the enthusiastic laudations of the crowd, the tears were raining down Mr. Desmond's face.

"I call that acting," said he. "Clippett, did you say you knew that girl?"

"Certainly, I know her," said Major Clippett, with difficulty keeping the corners of his mouth in order. "She is coming to my house to-night to supper. Shall I introduce you?"

"I shall esteem it an honor to know a woman of such genius!" said Mr. Desmond.

"Oh, George!" cried his wife, "didn't you recognize her? Our Ella!"

"Not Ella!" cried Mr. Desmond, starting up. "My daughter Ella?"

"And no other," said the Major. "Well, I don't wonder that you didn't know her. She has changed wonderfully. She's a genius, you know, is Ella!"

And when the beautiful young Ophelia was folded in her father's arms that night his heart throbbed high with pride, while Essie stood smilingly by, and Major Clippett took infinite credit to himself for all that had transpired.

"They live here with me and my sister," said he. "They are my adopted daughters. But we wanted to surprise you, so they are staying temporarily with a friend. They are both artists, Desmond; they have conquered their own destiny, God bless them, and achieved success."

"Our girls!" said Mrs. Desmond, softly—and the familiar words which he had so often spoken, in a sort of contemptuous toleration, grated harshly on her husband's ear.

"Our girls!" he repeated. "Our treasures, wife! I have been sighing all my life for a son, but I shall never sigh any more. My girls are all sufficient to me now!"

And of all the triumphs which Ella and Essie Desmond have won this hour was the sweetest to them!—Ernestine McMullen, in N. Y. Ledger.

Salaries of Foreign Statesmen.

In Belgium each member of the Chamber of Representatives receives £16 16s. a month if he does not live in Brussels. In Denmark members of both houses receive 15 shillings a day during the session. In France Senators and Deputies are paid £356 per annum, and the same rate obtains in Austria. In Portugal Peers and Deputies receive £67 a year. In Holland members of the Lower House receive £166 per annum. In Greece, Roumania, Norway and Sweden Senators and Deputies are paid, as also are the members of the local German Legislatures. In Switzerland members of the National Council get 10 shillings a day, and members of the State Council from 6 to 10 shillings. In Italy neither Senators nor Deputies are paid, but they travel free and receive other concessions in taxes and patronage. In the United States Senators and Deputies receive £208 per annum. BILLINGSGATE MARKET.

One of the Most Unique Sights to be Witnessed Anywhere in the World.

The great gong striking the hour of five in the morning announces that the salesmen of the market are to begin business, and with a hurry-scurrying rush they reach their desks, surrounding which are a number of low benches or tables, upon which are placed the fish that are put up at auction, sold and speedily cleared away to give place for new stock, this process being repeated over and over again until the sale closes. As fast as the fish arrive in Billingsgate, after the day's sales begin, they are rapidly disposed of at auction, the salesmen using their long account books, instead of a hammer, to knock down the goods. One can not imagine a more novel sight than can be witnessed here in the early morning when business is at its full swing, the porters rushing hither and thither with packages of fish on their heads, quite regardless of whom they may jostle or bedaub, for no one stands on ceremony, and politeness can not be observed in the midst of a pushing, surging crowd, every individual of which seems to think only of the business that he is intent upon. "The only comparison," says Sala, "I can find for the aspect, the sights and sounds of the place is—a rush. A rush hither and thither at helter-skelter speed, apparently blindly, apparently without motive, but really with a business-like and engrossing pre-occupation for fish and all things fishy. Baskets borne on the shoulders of the facchini of the place skim through the air with such rapidity that you might take them to be flying-fish. Out of the way! Here is an animated salmon leap. Stand on one side! a shoal of fresh herring will swallow you up else." On all sides may be heard above the general din the stentorian tones of the loud-voiced salesmen, who, perched on their stands, and raised somewhat above the heads of the hurrying crowd around, shout their calls to attract buyers. From one we hear the cry: "Here, ye sole buyers, sole buyers, sole buyers, who'll have this fine trunk of soles?" While a rival calls out: "This way, ye haddock buyers, come on, haddock buyers, give us an offer for this lot of fine haddocks." Others call for "cod buyers," "plaice buyers," etc., through the whole list, perhaps, of edible fishes, until the confusion of sounds is so great that a stranger can scarcely comprehend how business can be conducted under such circumstances, and it would be impossible for one who has not seen it to form any conception of such a scene as may be witnessed on any week-day morning at Billingsgate. One thing is more remarkable, perhaps, than any thing else, namely, the method of bidding, which seems peculiar to the place, for though we tried hard to catch the sound of a buyer's voice, or to detect a sign by which he indicated his bid, we ingloriously failed in every instance, which was rather mortifying when we were made aware that the sharp-eyed or keen-eared salesman had received dozens of offers from persons in the crowd almost at our elbow. As fast as the fish are sold they are removed by porters and the vacant places filled by new material until the sales end for the day. While fish are sold at auction in Billingsgate the system of selling by Dutch auctions generally prevails in the markets of the smaller ports where there are no licensed auctioneers.—Bulletin United States Fish Commission.

THE POET TENNYSON.

A Number of Anecdotes Illustrating His Eccentricity.

A few years ago some enthusiastic admirers of Tennyson gave a large dinner party in his honor, and invited all their choicest friends in the world of literature and art to meet him. Tennyson, who rarely accepts an invitation, did, for a wonder, put in an appearance on this occasion, but during the first half of the dinner caused the greatest disappointment by remaining absolutely silent, and as if lost in the most profound reverie. The guests, who had expected to hang on words falling like pearls of thought from his lips, gazed somewhat wistfully upon him, when, rousing suddenly, he exclaimed in a loud, stentorian voice: "I like my mutton cut in chunks!" It is likely that there was something of malice prepense in this burst of confidence, and that the poor man felt a not unnatural irritation at being gaped at and a corresponding desire to punish the offenders.

An anecdote told not long ago by his daughter-in-law is amusing, in that it shows how the greatest are not incapable of stooping to little weaknesses. Some very dear friends of Tennyson, who had been spending some years in Persia, returned to London, and, anxious to renew old ties, wrote inviting him to their house. But Tennyson mistook the day, and arriving at the domicile found the birds flown. Sitting down to write a note of explanation, he had the misfortune to throw the contents of a well-filled inkbottle all over the beautiful new white Persian carpet. The maid-servant in answer to his summons, appeared with a large jug of new milk, which she poured over the offending ink-stain. "I'll give you five shillings, my good girl, my very good girl," continued Tennyson, in much agitation, "if you will only get rid of that abominable ink before your master and mistress come home." And together, on their hands and knees, poet and servant rubbed and rubbed at the wretched carpet until not a spot remained. The girl earned her five shillings, and when, a few weeks afterward, Tennyson went to dire with his friends, he had every reason to believe that she had told no tales. At any rate his host and hostess displayed their gorgeous carpet without signs of consciousness.—N. Y. Weekly.

Not for the Old Man.

"Any arsenic?" softly asked the little woman as the druggist came forward with his usual retail smile.

"Yes'm."

"I'd like a quarter's worth, please."

"Yes'm. How are you going to administer it?"

"Why—why, on cheese or bread, I suppose. Isn't that the general way?"

"Some give it in coffee."

"Why, rats don't drink coffee, do they?"

"Oh! it's for rats, eh? Then cheese is the proper thing."—Detroit Free Press.

VICTORY IS OURS.

We Lead Them All—Highest Premiums in Our Class—Bronze Medal Awarded.

There is no proprietary medicine in the world that has grown in popularity and favor in so short a period of time as the remedy known as the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure. The Sierra Chemical Co., Manufacturers of these justly renowned goods is composed of bright active men of thorough and long experience in their line of business. They have shown wonderful enterprise in bringing before the public a purely vegetable compound, the chief ingredients of which are composed of herbs gathered on the sides and in the canyons of the noted Sierra Range of mountains. This Company have received the highest award given to any medicine at the Mechanics' Exhibition, 1889, and awarded by a committee made up of Professors Rising and Wenzell, the best known analytical chemists on this coast. This is enough to prove its merit as a true remedy, delightful to the taste, and as a positive cure for all Kidney, Liver and bladder troubles it has no equal on earth. All druggists.

THE WINNER.

The Promptness with Which Mr. Harris Received His Money from The Louisiana State Lottery.

The fact of the winning of the $15,000 by our townsman Henry Harris in the last drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery is not new to our people, but meeting the ex-sheriff yesterday, we asked him if he had yet received his check and if he was going to endow some charitable institution with the money. Mr. Harris replied, "That the money had promptly come, and that everything connected with its receipt had been most satisfactorily done. I like" said he, "the way The Louisiana State Lottery Company do business. The fortunate holder of the winning number sends his ticket to the home office and as soon as the mail can return a check is received for the full amount. There is no quibbling, no discounting, no delays, everything is done promptly and squarely. As to what to do with the money I haven't yet exactly settled. An endowed medical college bearing my name would read fine and perpetuate the Harris name for all time to come, would it not," he said turning to the news gatherer, "but" he added, "I am not seeking fame, and guess I will invest the money in real estate in the best county in the State of California—Napa—and enjoy the fruits of my good fortune."—Napa (Cal.) Reporter, November 12.

HOPE FOR THE SICK.

One Remedy for One Disease.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a single bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of domestic remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The specific for Catarrh cures that and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. To these is added a specific for Fever and Ague, one for female weakness—a general tonic and blood-maker that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility." These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease is sent free on application by HOSPITAL REMEDY COMPANY, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

The Origin

Of the famous medicine, Hood's Sarsaparilla is interesting. Among the customers at the pharmacy of C. I. Hood & Co., in Lowell, Mass., many years ago, was a gentleman who suffered intensely from neuralgic pains, and who said if he was sure he must endure such agony much longer he should commit suicide. After trying many physicians without success, he one day took to Mr Hood a prescription from a Boston physician which included ingredients the experienced pharmacist had never seen used in the same combination. The result of the new medicine was awaited with interest, and soon the patient announced himself entirely cured. The idea of this peculiar combination haunted Mr. Hood, for in it he believed was the germ of success. To it was added various alterative, diuretic and anti-bilious remedies, and after long study and careful experiment the now popular Hood's Sarsaparilla was the result.

'Tis sad to see a woman growing old before her time,
All broken-down and hopeless when life should hold its prime;
She feels herself a burden when a blessing she should be,
And longs for death to bring her release from misery.

If these poor, discouraged women who suffer from diseases peculiar to women could only know that health could be regained by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, how eagerly they would hasten to avail themselves of it. They ought to know it, and try it. Every woman who is still healthy ought to be told about the wonderful virtue in this medicine, and understand that it is a safeguard against the terrible diseases common to her sex. It is guaranteed to give satisfaction or money paid for it will be refunded.

Cleanse the liver, stomach, bowels and whole system by using Dr. Pierce's Pellets.

We kneed not weed, we doughnot know
But that he'll win the heav'nly prize.
Perchance, he took some of his yeast,
If so, then he will surely rise.

A NEW TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result of this discovery is that a simple remedy has been discovered which permanently cures the most aggravated cases of these distressing diseases by a few simple applications made (two weeks apart) by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free by A. H. DIXON & SON, 337 and 339 West King Street, Toronto, Canada.

PRINTING THE BIBLE.

How and When the First Copies Were Issued in the United States.

The sacred history of American printing, the introduction into the New World of the Bible will interest. The earliest publication on this continent of any portion of the Scriptures was the translation of the New Testament into the Natick dialect, the ordinary speech of the Indians at the time the Pilgrim Fathers landed in 1620. This translation was made by John Eliot, a native of England and a graduate of the university of Cambridge. The work of translation, with the aid of an Indian, was the labor of eight years; and it is now conceded to be one of the most notable contributions to philology made in this country.

To meet the demands of emigrants who had largely settled in Pennsylvania, the first edition of the Holy Scriptures in the German language, and the first in a European tongue, was printed by Christopher Saur, at Germantown in 1743. It is a notable fact that neither the Old nor the New Testament was ever printed here in the English language till after this country had declared independence. So oppressive was the monopoly that the British government maintained over the exclusive printing of the Bible that it never transferred its authority to reprint it, even in her own colonies; and every copy had to be imported across the Atlantic. Robert Aitken, a native of Scotland, who had settled as a printer in Philadelphia, issued in 1777 an edition of the New Testament, the first in the English language, with an American imprint.

For this breach of privilege, Aitken was imprisoned. After his release this zealous Scotchman announced to the members of congress then in session his intention to print an edition of The Entire Bible, and asked for their imprimatur, which was readily granted, together with the certificate of the chaplains, the venerable William White, the future Episcopal bishop, and Rev. Dr. Duffield. Here the action of congress properly terminated and the circulation of the Bible was, ever after, left to the people and to their pastors.

Aitken's promised edition, copied from the authorized English version, appeared in 1782, printed in brevier type, having on the title page the significant motto of Virtue, Liberty and Independence. This will always be prized as the first Bible in the English language ever printed in America. A perfect copy is preserved among the treasures in the Lenox library. In 1790 a neat edition of the New Testament was printed at New York by Hugh Gaine; and another in New Haven by A. Morse, the latter replete with errors on every page. In 1791 the first folio edition of a Bible, with fifty copper plates, was printed at Worcester, Mass., by Isaiah Thomas, the text revised by Dr. Bancroft, father of the historian and the biographer of Washington.

In the same year an edition of the Sacred Scriptures was carefully and correctly printed for the use of Quakers by one of the Friends of Trenton, in New Jersey. In 1794 the New Testament, without the Old, was issued at Boston; and in 1798 the first hot pressed edition of a Bible appeared in handsome form at Philadelphia. In colonial days, under British rule, rigid penal laws were enforced against the printing of Roman Catholic works; even their devotional books appeared by stealth. One of the results of the Revolution was the absolute freedom of the printing press.—Current Literature.

HISTORY OF HAYTI.

Something About the Origin and Development of the Negro Republic.

When Hayti was discovered by Columbus, who landed upon the island on December 6, 1492, there was a large population. The natives were of a low type, and it has been estimated that there were not fewer than from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000. The Spaniards who then visited the island speak of them as feeble in intellect and defective both physically and morally. It was not long before European adventurers, who had gone to the new country to reap the harvests of gold supposed to be waiting and to be had for the taking made slaves of the natives, some of whom stoutly resisted the invasion and chains of the invader. It is stated that such was the cruelty of the slavery that after thirty years of it there were very few natives remaining. In the year 1505 some negroes were imported, and in 1517 a royal edict authorized the importation from Africa of 4,000 negroes a year. These were much better able to bear the burdens and the climate, and it was not many years before the negroes had multiplied so rapidly that the island soon had few but them and their descendants. In the course of time there were several classes in Hayti—whites, free people of color, thrifty mulatoes, and slaves. The free people of color became wealthy and powerful and in subsequent years had much to do with the political and other development of the country. The French revolution—Hayti had meanwhile passed to the control of France—gave the free people of color their opportunity, and joining with the blacks, they were led by Toussaint L'Ouverture to a position of independence. The treatment by the French of this great man and gallant leader resulted in the driving out of the Gallic forces and the complete recognition of the island government by the nations. There have been troubles since then, but no such difficulties as existed when Toussaint was betrayed, only to die in prison far away from his native land.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

THE GROCER.

Origin of the Word and Its Application at the Present Day.

The following interesting paper on the origin of the word "grocer" was read before the Michigan State Grocers' Association by Mr. Robert M. Floyd, of Chicago: Of all lines of trade there is, perhaps, none more generally interesting than the "grocery" business as conducted in the United States. The extent and variety of the stock represented in a grocery store is not paralleled in any other line of business, and the various points from which merchandise is drawn are almost incredible. Take some of the simple articles which come readily to mind: Sugar from Cuba; raisins from Spain; teas from China; coffees from Brazil; punch from Sweden; pepper from Turkey; spermaceti from the polar regions; honey from California and wooden nutmegs from Connecticut. It will no doubt interest you to know where the word "grocer" came from. Wrights' dictionary of obsolete words and terms gives grocer, a wholesale merchant, as one who speculates at markets and fairs, and claims this is the origin of the word. Now, this may be so, but on further and more careful examination we find that at this same period as mentioned by Wright, a grocer meant a general dealer in goods, and was known as a "grosser," one who sells by the gross or by wholesale. Johnson says that it came from grosser (from gross). So according to the direct definition and etymology of the word, it meant any one who sold in wholesale quantities or by the gross.

Dealers in merchandise were of two kinds: Wholesalers, called grossers or engrossers, and retailers, called regrators (hucksters). An old work, called "Putnam's World's Progress," gives the following: Grocers, one of the oldest trades in England, and anciently meant engrossers or monopolizers, as appears by statute, 37 Edward III. The "Grocery Company" is one of the twelve chief companies in the city of London, incorporated in 1429. Now, as you readily see, this does not refer in any way to your present line of business, but rather, as I have said, to any general wholesale merchandise business, and did not refer as it does now to the sale of sugar, teas and other edible commodities. Such dealers, or rather dealers in such commodities, were then called "spicers." Richard Grant White in his essay on misspelled words, calls attention toward the word "grosser," and says it should be used in that way instead of "grocer." But now, as it seems a very good word, and as we have grown used to it, we had better leave it as it is. I can recall an old sign in New York City that read "Grocers and spicers," but when "spicers and grossers" first merged into "grocers" I am at a loss to ascertain. As people's needs increased, and with them a desire for a more convenient place to buy general stocks of food, it is natural the grocer has absorbed, by degrees, the many branches which were at one time distinctive trades, and we find now under the general head "grocer" what was formerly known as: The chandler—dealer and manufacturer of soap, candles, oil, etc. The fish-monger—dealer in all varieties of dried, fresh and smoked fish. The wine and spirit merchant, whose occupation we can well judge from the name. The green-grocer, or dealer in fresh garden products, or butter, eggs, etc. The poulterer, or dealer in live or dressed poultry, game, etc. The spicer or dealer in teas, sugars, spices, etc. The tobacconist; the name fully indicates the business. The Italian warehouse man, who sold oils, dried and preserved fruits, olives, sardines, etc. The prunes, dealt exclusively in tropfruiter, who sold fresh fruits. The ical and domestic dealer in cheese. cheese-monger or dealer in a country You can readily see that progressive like America, where the pioneering element predominates, and there is no time for barter, the merchant has gradually drawn all these several lines under his care and merged them into a general business, and now the grocer of to-day is a representative buyer of the food products of all countries. He is, perforce, an educator of tastes in the food people eat. It is through his industries and persuasions that even Americans were taught that it was just the thing to eat Russian caviare, although no one after the first month could possibly prefer it to old Boston baked beans. The grocer of to-day is a far different man to the spicer of three or four centuries ago. Then he was only one of the many trades, now the many trades center in him. You have reason to feel proud of your business, and of being a grocer. The step from the retailer to the wholesaler is but a short one. The intelligence required in retail business is not excelled by that needed by the wholesaler. There is no better educated class of men in trade than the grocer, and I will prove it when I tell you that three years ago at a banquet given to Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, of England, which was attended by the brightest legal and professional minds of our country, the crowning speech of the evening was made by a merchant, a wholesale grocer, Mr. Franklin MacVeagh, of Chicago.—Chicago Times.

Hard Lines for Lawyers.

Ambitious young Americans in and out of college who are aiming at glory and fortune by way of a law office will get entertainment, if not inspiration, out of this advertisement, published among the regular advertisements of the Daily Register—the New York lawyers' organ:

ANY LAW OFFICE THAT DESIRES THE services of an experienced attorney, at a salary of five (5) dollars per week, please address, etc.

"Five dollars a week" isn't an unusual salary, either, for the "experienced attorney" in this town at present, so a man standing high at the bar of any law-office of consequence in New York is overrun with applicants for work at any price. Hod carriers are in better demand.—N. Y. Times.

KING MTESA.

The Most Notable Potentate of Purely Native Origin Produced by the Dark Continent.

The King of Uganda, whose death we announced on Wednesday, was, for Africa, a remarkable man, probably the most notable potentate of purely native origin that the dark continent has produced. According to the estimate of Colonel Grant, who, with Speke, was his guest twenty-three years ago, Mtesa was probably not more than forty-eight years of age at the time of his death, and, having succeeded his father, Suna, in 1857, he has reigned twenty-eight years. The Waganda have the names of thirty-five Kings who have reigned down to the time of Mtesa in regular succession, and, as Colonel Grant points out, may probably account for the "blue blood" and vanity which certainly ran in the veins of Mtesa. This vanity comes out in all the narratives we have from foreign visitors—Speke and Grant, Stanley, and Wilson and Felkin. It was excusable in a potentate who had probably never been a hundred miles from home, and who had never come into contact with any greater power than his own, to send ambassadors to the Queen of England, and to believe their reports of the insignificance of the British Empire as compared with Uganda. Probably, however, no other native African Prince, not even the Muata Janvo himself, had been able to organize a state so completely and make so great an advance toward civilization as the King who has just died and his predecessors. Colonel Grant, who knew him well, speaks of him (Proc. R. G. S., vol. v., p. 479) in terms of real respect, and his estimate is essentially supported by such men as Sir Samuel Baker and Mr. Stanley. We have all read the latter's long, interesting and dramatic account of his many conversations with Mtesa about civilization and Christianity. As we know, the result of Mr. Stanley's visit was that Protestant missions were established in the country, and, according to the missionaries' own reports, have had gratifying success. But Mtesa was much perplexed when he learned that there are two Christian religions, the adherents of which are as hostile to each other as both are to Mohammedanism or heathanism. For a time, we believe, the Roman Catholic emissaries succeeded in placing their Protestant brethren under the shadow of Mtesa's neglect, if not absolute displeasure, and in the end he and his chiefs abandoned both and reverted to Mohammedanism. As might be expected, the missionaries from their point of view do not speak so favorably of the late King as the explorers. Certainly from the European point of view Mtesa was guilty of great cruelties; but, as Colonel Grant shows, these apparently indiscriminate sacrifices of human life were really the recognized and organized modes of administering justice in Uganda. Mtesa himself was evidently a man governed largely by impulse. It was a good point in his character that, when Colonel Grant visited him, he made a point of visiting his mother every two days at least. When Baker, as Colonel Grant reminds us, was all but defeated by the Wanyoro, a force from Uganda arriving in the distance was the cause of the dispersion of the enemy. Mtesa forwarded letters from Baker to Livingstone by his swift-footed soldiers, who, after a journey of six hundred miles, found the veteran traveler was dead. These and other facts, which may be read in the pages of the travelers we have mentioned, show that Mtesa was capable of taking a real interest in matters far outside the range of the ordinary savage mind. His army, wonderfully organized and diciplined, Mr. Stanley estimates at 125,000 men, and his fleet at 500 canoes. The population of Uganda proper is probably about a million, but with neighboring dependent territories about three millions. The capital is finely situated on the slopes of the north shore of Lake Victoria Nyanza, from which, as Mr. Stanley's illustration shows, a broad path leads up to the royal quarters. It is gratifying to learn that there have been comparatively little violence and bloodshed at the change of monarchy. It used to be the custom at the coronation of the new King to sacrifice his brothers, a custom which the late King evidently regarded as perfectly natural. Mtesa's brothers, at the time of Colonel Grant's visit, went about in chains, but all the same, and though conscious of their fate, "conversed, and attended picnics, and boated, and played musical instruments with their brother, the King, with perfect freedom of action and of speech." What all the outside influences have been that have had a civilizing effect on Uganda before it was discovered by Europeans, we do not know; what they have been since we do know pretty fully, and the results so far have been on the whole good. It is to be hoped that, under the young prince who now succeeds his father, this native state may be allowed to develop itself along its own lines, without any undue attempt to force it into European grooves; above all things both prince and people pray to be delivered from European "protection."—London Times.

—Recently some wood-cutters in Wurtemberg came upon the remains of what seems to have been an extensive set of farm buildings of the Roman period, the upper story of which was built in compartments. A subterranean heating chamber was also found; at least this may be inferred from the rows of short pillars, on which flags rested, ornamented with tiles, both flags and tiles being perforated with holes to allow the escape of heat to the chamber.

—The following is a new remedy for blackleg in cattle, and it is said to be excellent: Add to one hundred pounds of salt ten pounds of sulphur, six pounds of copperas, three pounds saltpeter and three pints of slaked lime. Mix and feed in the same manner as when feeding salt.

—After suffering some days from rheumatism, as she supposed, a Michigan woman consulted a physician, and was astonished upon learning that her shoulder was out of joint. She has no idea of how or when the accident occurred.—Detroit Post.

OPIUM.

The Bengali Legend of the Discovery of the Sleep-Producing Drug.

According to the Bengali legend, there once lived on the banks of the holy River Ganga a Rishi, or sage, in whose hut, made of palm leaves, there was a mouse which became a favorite with the seer, and was endowed by him with the gift of speech. After awhile the mouse, having been frightened by a cat, at its earnest solicitations was changed by Rishi into a cat; then, alarmed by dogs into a dog; then into an ape; then into a bear; then into an elephant, and finally, being still discontented with its lot, into a beautiful maiden, to whom the sage gave the name of "Postomani," or the "poppy-seed lady." One day, while tending her plants, the King approached the Rishi's cottage, and was invited to rest and refresh himself by Postomani, who offered him some delicious fruit. The King, however, struck by the girl's beauty, refused to eat until she had told him of her parentage. Postomani, to deceive the king, told him she was a Princess whom the Rishi had found in the woods and had brought up. The upshot was that the King made love to the girl, and they were married by the holy sage. She was treated as the favorite Queen, and was very happy; but one day while standing by a well she turned giddy, fell into the water, and died. The Rishi then appeared before the King and begged him not to give way to consuming grief, assuring him that the late Queen was not of royal blood. Said he: "She was a mouse, and, according to her own wish, I changed her successively into a cat, a dog, an ape, a bear, an elephant and a lovely girl. Let her body remain in the well; fill up the well with earth. Out of her flesh and bones will grow a tree, which shall be called after her, 'Posto,' that is, the 'poppy-tree.' From this tree will be obtained a drug called 'opium,' which will be either swallowed or smoked till the end of time. The opium swallower or smoker will have one quality of each of the animals to which Postomani was transformed. He will be mischievous, like a mouse; fond of milk, like a cat; quarrelsome, like a dog; filthy, like an ape; savage, like a bear, and high tempered, like a Queen."—Weekly Medical Review.

DIABETES.

Description of a Most Distressing and Prevalent Complaint.

The chief characteristic of this disease is an abnormal amount of sugar in the blood. The cause of it is quite uncertain. According to Flint, it occurs in the vast majority of cases between the ages of thirty and fifty; in men much oftener than in women. It may exist a long time before it is noticed, and then continue years before proving fatal. It often gives a fatal issue to otherwise mild diseases. Its chief test is a large percentage of sugar in the water, the quantity of the latter, also, generally, not always, being increased.

Among the earlier symptoms are [illegible] thirst, a strong appetite, dryness [illegible] mouth and acid saliva; later, [illegible]ation, increasing muscular feebleness, and in many cases irritability, melancholy and mental weakness. To [illegible] it, it must be taken in its early [illegible]. One third or more of its cases end in consumption.

A diabetic patient, when the disease has become confirmed, is liable to sudden death. The heart may fail from paralysis of its nerves; or, the blood-poison affecting the brain, the person may sink into a state of insensibility, delirium and coma (fatal lethargy). A slight cold may bring on this result. So may more constipation and undue physical exertion, mental emotion, or anxiety.

Flint says: "The disease seems to me less formidable than heretofore, provided proper treatment be adopted and persisted in." The main thing is to arrange for the patient a diet which excludes, as far as possible, sugar and starch, and induce him rigidly to continue it. While cutting off so many articles of the ordinary diet, pains must be taken to supply their place with others sufficiently nutritious and appetizing. Gluten bread may take the place of common wheat bread. It contains only one-third as much starch as that made from entire wheat, and is acceptable to the taste.

The body should be carefully protected against the influence of atmospheric changes, and the skin be kept in a good condition. There should be exercise in the open air, but it should be moderate. Mental relaxation and recreation should be secured.—Youth's Companion.

HITTING A NAIL ON THE HEAD.

A Practical Illustration of an Important Principle.

"Papa, what is meant by always hitting the nail on the head, in daily life?"

"It simply means, my son, that you come directly to the point in all your dealings with the world."

"But how, papa?"

"Well, let me see. Hum! Ah, I have it! Run out to the shed and get me a nail, a hammer and a pine block."

"Here they are, papa."

"Very good. Now I will place the block on my knee so. Then I will hold the nail all ready for being driven into the block so. Now take the hammer and strike the nail directly on the head and it will enter the block. If you strike all around the nail, without hitting it, your blows will be wasted. Are you ready, my son?"

"Yes, papa."

"Then—go!"

"————————————!!"

"Put that arnica bottle back in its place, and then spend the rest of the afternoon filling the wood-box. If I catch you shirking I'll baste you within an inch of your life. Do you hear?"

"But, papa—was the blow wasted?"—Detroit Journal.

Poe's Kindliness to a Young Savant.

[Christian Union.]

Trudging along the road near a Pennsylvania village, his pockets filled with snakes, toads, and bugs, the 10 or 12 years old Aughey—whose instinctive love for these creatures found its earliest expression in gathering them up in this way—was suddenly stopped by a young man. He had a pale face, dark hair, a high forehead, and deep-set, piercing eyes. He had a serious, unhappy air, but his voice was kindly as he bid the young naturalist come to him.

"Now," said he, "do you know what this is?" taking one of the harmless little snakes.

The boy only knew its common, local name; whereupon the young man told him its correct scientific name, after making his delighted pupil now territorial geologist of Wyoming) repeat the ponderous words to be sure he understood them correctly. Then he went on with each reptile and each bug he had in his possession, until the child had imparted his fascinating object lesson, the many-pointed names of each specimen being firmly fixed in his mind by some little history of the habits of each, showing how closely they had one and all been studied by his teacher.

After that first meeting many others followed, in which the patient, loving labors of the teacher were amply rewarded by the glowing enthusiasm of the pupil. Finally, the boy was told that whenever he was puzzled in his researches to write a letter, asking what he desired to know, to be deposited in the village post office. He availed himself of the offer, and, in addition to the definite and precise information sought, the teacher would criticise, with delicate tact, the composition of the letter itself.

The Royal Purple of Tyre.

[Lower California Letter.]

Put to us the most curious of all is the Buccinum purpura and its relative, the stationary Murex, the same little creatures which furnished the royal purple of imperial Tyre. Betsy and I have been dabbling in the same branch of business, and in the course of our experiments have converted all our available paraphernalia into purple of varying shades. The story goes that a favorite dog of the Tyrian Hercules, while prowling about the seashore, accidentally broke a buccinum shell, which stained his mouth such a gorgeous color that Tyrus, Hercules' sweetheart, vowed never to see her lover again until he should bring her a robe of the same hue. Thus constrained, Hercules gathered a great quantity of the shells, and persevered till the nymph was gratified and the art given to the world. A white vein, growing transversely in a little hollow near the head of the fish, holds the precious dye. Each tiny creature yields but one drop, and hence the real Tyrian purple vied in value with gold itself.

If one wishes to try the experiment of Hercules, let him proceed in this wise: After sufficient liquid has been extracted, drop by drop, from the throat of the fishes, wet the wool or cotton in it and spread it in the sun. At first it appears pale green, then the color of the sea, and in a few minutes sky blue; then it deepens to purplish red, and in an hour or more turns to gorgeous purple. By washing the linen at once, it changes to a brilliant crimson; but when the color is once set nothing can fade or turn it.

Andrew Jackson's Tenderness.

[Cor. Cleveland Leader.]

"People have little idea of the tenderness of President Jackson's heart," said Gen. Trinkeroff. "Even on his death-bed, when his body was racked with the pains of fast-approaching dissolution, his kindness of heart was shown in nearly every act, one of his daughter's stories well illustrating this. Mrs. Jackson, Jr., had some rare and tropical plants which she prized very highly and tended with a great deal of care. But a few days before he died, when he knew his end was near, Gen. Jackson called his adopted son Andrew to his bedside and, pointing to the plants which were standing on the front veranda, said: 'Andrew, I can't live but a few days, and when my funeral takes place there will doubtless be a great many people here. Unless you take some way to protect those plants they will be broken off or destroyed or taken away. Now, Sarah is very proud of them, and I think that when that time comes you should have those plants carried to the upper veranda and lock the windows and then they will be safe.

"He died a few days afterward. His directions in this respect were not observed, and Mrs. Jackson's plants were destroyed or carried away in pieces or as a whole as mementos of the occasion."

Palm-Tree "Toddy."

[Madras Letter.]

Palms grow in abundance, and the cocoanut is a large source of profit to the cultivator. In southern India they have a peculiar way of extracting juice therefrom for the manufacture of an intoxicating drink called "toddy." A cut is made at the end of the growing fruit, and to the latter a small earthen pot is attached to catch the oozings. Twice a day the liquid is collected by men, who climb the trees in a curious fashion. They have a sort of strap of bamboo about seven or eight feet long, which they fasten around the tree and around their own bodies just above the waist. They also have a smaller strap of the same sort around their feet. They ascend the tree by raising the strap a foot or so up the trunk, and then they pull themselves up by it, and they climb up and down very rapidly and easily.

Balloon Photography.

[Chicago Journal.]

The Triboulet system of photographing all the country as seen from a captive balloon has succeeded well in France. A very small balloon carries up to the necessary height the photographic apparatus, the panoramic object glass of which is provided with a valve which can be opened through an electric current managed by the operator, who remains on the ground. The impressions obtained are useful for military purposes.

Japanese "Bad Word."

Swearing is wholly unknown in Japan. The worst word a Japanese ever applies to a man whom he dislikes is "beast."

HOW TO DIE IN PERSIA.

Charms as a Last Resort—Reading from the Koran—Hired Mourners.

[St. James' Gazette.]

The sick man lies in extremis on a thin mattress upon the floor, covered by a quilted silken coverlet. Twenty or thirty persons are in the room where he is dying. The smoke of many hubble-bubbles clouds the air; whispered conversation is general. The doctors have declared their patient's condition hopeless, and, as a last resort, certain charms suggested by a weird looking dervish have been tried. But the crab broth, prepared from the tiny crustaceans that inhabit the streamlets round Shiraz, the patient has been unable to swallow; and the dervish points out to the relatives of the dying man that his panacea has only proved infallible because it was tried too late. A veiled woman, the wife of the dying man, sits weeping at the side of her husband's pillow. She frequently holds to his face a moistened piece of mud torn from the wall (this wetted mud is supposed to have a very reviving influence, and is used by Persians as we use smelling salts).

Tea is handed round in small cups; the crowd in the room becomes greater; every window is shut, and, as the outside temperature is 90 degrees, some idea of the heat within can be formed. The crowd is not here from mere curiosity. A man is sick; then where should his friends be, they say, if not by his bedside? The samovars (Russian tea urns) steam and bubble; the room is filled with clouds of tobacco smoke and the steam from the urns, and now, just as 200 years ago was done in England, a fowl is killed and placed warm and bleeding on the patient's feet. All is of no avail, however. The man has breathed his last.

The wife yields her place by the bedside. Moistened cotton-wool is placed in the mouth of the dead, in the orifices of the nostrils, and in the ears. A moollah begins to read aloud the prescribed portion of the Koran, commencing "O man, I swear by the instructive Koran thou art one of the messengers of God sent to show the right way," etc. This portion of the Mussulman's sacred book was called by Mohammed himself "the heart of the Koran." And now all present witness aloud that the dead man was a good pious Mohammedan. The limbs are composed and a cup of water is placed at the head of the corpse. No sooner is this done than a moollah ascends to the flat roof of the house and begins to read in a shrill monotone certain verses from the holy book. This announces to the neighbors that the man is veritably dead; and at the same moment his relations shriek and wail, "Wo, wo! he is dead; he has passed away." These are the expressions of real grief. But presently the professional mourners arrive and rend the air with their shrill screaming, which is like the "keening" of the Irish.

The house is soon filled with friends and neighbors, who add their cries to the screams of the mourners. The women of the family hasten to array themselves in "bitter" (i. e. somber) garments—not in actual black, but in sad colors; neither they nor the men wash or dress their hair until the funeral and the first days of mourning are over. The male relatives do not literally rend their garments, but give them the right appearance by opening certain seams of their coats and cloaks with a penknife; and instead of casting dust upon their heads they dab mud on their hats.

And now come the "washers of the dead." To each parish are attached a family of these people, who get a despised livelihood by performing the last offices for the dead. The corpse having been washed at an adjoining stream, the hands are placed across the chest, and it is wrapped in the shroud of cotton cloth that the deceased has probably had by him as a sort of memento mori for years. Camphor (real vegetable camphor) is placed beneath the shroud, and the body is laid in a rough coffin made of thin planks and brought back to the house. The coffin in Persia is of a thin and unsubstantial kind, and the burial always takes place within twenty-four hours of decease.

Drunkards in Turkey.

[St. James' Gazette.]

According to Pouqueville, "a Turk who falls down in the street overtaken with wine, and is arrested by the guard, is sentenced to the bastinado. This punishment is repeated as far as the third offense, after which he is reputed incorrigible, and receives the title of 'imperial drunkard' or 'privileged drunkard.' If after that he is taken up and in danger of the bastinado, he has only to name himself, to mention what part of the town he inhabits, and to say he is a privileged drunkard; he is then released and sent to sleep on the warm ashes of the baths." Pouqueville had been in Constantinople at the commencement of the present century, since which time, a good many changes have been introduced into the city of the sultans; but an improved way with inebriates is scarcely one of them.

London Gin.

[The Current.]

The temperance men are doing some good as chemists. They have learned the actual ingredients of London gin to be "alchohol, water, uralic-acid, tartaric-acid, acetic-acid, ether, sugar, oil of juniper with a trace of oil of turpentine." It does kill millions. It would slay all who drink it were it not that the tartaric acid destroys the bad effect of the uralic-acid, the acetic-acid in turn overcomes the fatality of the tartaric element, the ether and sugar then arrest the tartaric acid in its work of dissolution; these then are overcome by the oil of juniper and at last the man is left to die of the oil of turpentine. Good spring water is a much better drink than gin.

Solar Engines for the Soudan.

[Exchange.]

Not long ago Capt. Ericsson boiled water by the sun's rays, using heat accumulators, invented by him, and The London Telegraph points out that if the sun of New York can be made to do this, the sun of Soudan can be utilized in driving the locomotives on the Berber railway, now building.

A BEAUTIFUL CUSTOM.

The Bee-Maidens of France and the Good Work Done by Them.

Every one of my readers who lives in the country, and probably every one who lives in the city, knows that the reason the bees bury themselves in the flowers is that they may extract the nectar of which they make their delicious honey. But perhaps there are not many of either country or city readers who know that the honeymakers, besides helping themselves, also help the flowers they visit.

Sometimes, indeed, if it were not for the visits of the bees, the flowers would not live at all; for some flowers are what is called imperfect, and need to be powdered with what is known as pollen before they can make any seeds. And the bees carry the pollen from a perfect flower to an imperfect flower, and leave it there while they are thinking only of getting nectar. If you will catch a bee which has been gathering nectar, you will notice that it is covered with a fine dust. That dust is the pollen which has clung to the fine hairs on its body. And if you should by chance not know what pollen is, you have only to put a buttercup to baby's little chin to "find out if he loves butter," and you will see the golden pollen-dust all over the white skin.

It often happens with highly cultivated strawberries that they have imperfect flowers, and would not bear a single berry were they not planted near to some other variety that has perfect flowers. Occasionally it happens to an apple-tree that it bears only imperfect flowers, and then it must either depend upon the nectar-hunting bees or upon some other agency for the pollen.

Near the little town of La Ferte, in France—I think it is La Ferte—there is an apple-tree which bears only imperfect blossoms; and the fact having long ago been discovered, has given rise to a very beautiful custom among the maidens of the village. When spring-time comes, and the apple-tree hails the joyous time with a glad burst of blossom, the maidens of the village arm themselves with gay ribbons and perfect blossoms from their favorite trees, and go singing to the lonely tree which has produced only the imperfect blossoms. Each girl then kisses a cluster of the imperfect blossoms, and in so doing dusts the former with the pollen from the latter. She then ties a distinguishing ribbon near to the cluster she has dusted.

The tree looks very gay when thus decorated, with the pink blossoms smiling up at heaven and the dainty ribbons fluttering in the perfume-laden air; but the best of it is when the leaves drop like summer snow and the little apples begin to take shape. Then the maidens pluck off all but the best fruit, and let that take all the strength of the tree, so that the apples grow famously and come to perfection. And now is seen the strange part of the affair. The apples, instead of being all of one kind, are as different as the blossoms that kissed their blossoms, the fact being that the apple is exactly like the apple on the tree from which the pollen-bearing blossom was taken.

So on this one tree will be seen round, rosy-cheeked apples, long yellow apples, juicy apples, mealy apples, dainty little apples, and "monstrous big" apples. Each maiden has the apple she wished most to have.—Harper's Young People.

THE TELEGRAPHER'S EAR.

It Is the Chief Instrument of His Humdrum Profession.

The telegraph operator's ear is his principal stock in trade. It is the chief implement of his profession, and when it fails him he is decidedly out of luck. However, nature comes gallantly to the aid of those whose hearing begins to fail. That is, the same faculty of habit which enables the blind to do so many marvelous things without the aid of sight helps the unfortunate operator in his extremity. There is something about the sharp click of the telegraph instrument which appeals to the failing tympanum long after its ordinary sensitiveness is done. I have in my time met with a number of operators who were quite deaf—so much so that they were unable to understand unless spoken to at the top of the voice—who, when they sat down to the table, could take their pens and catch the sharp click of the instrument with the most perfect accuracy and ease. Another trouble is coming up now with that class of operators who use the type writer instead of the pen. It is an affection of the fingers, which become sore from constant thumping of the keys, and they frequently have to lay off and rest for days at a time. The introduction of the type-writer in telegraph work has not resulted in any benefit to the operators who use it. They can take a far larger report, but then the companies require full work of them, so it amounts to the same thing.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

—The folk lore of Southern Russia can be partially imagined from a case which came before a judge at Odessa. A man applied for a writ to compel his daughter to leave the house, because when she saluted her parents she did not bow to them. He said he would withdraw his application if she would ask pardon and make the regular obeisance. The girl agreed. She asked pardon; but when she bowed the father cried: "Lower. Down with your head; down below the girdle?" She replied: "I won't bend as low as that, not if I have to leave the house." The judge therefore ordered her to leave, but she gave in finally and bowed her head to the girdle.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

Mulholland & Mack
EDITORS & PROPRIETORS.
PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL
FRIDAY JANUARY 17..... 1890

County Official Paper.

As editor of the INYO INDEPENDENT I have never mixed in wretched little newspaper squabbles. A hearty contempt for the miserable objects and subjects of such wranglings, and also the certainty that but few besides the participants take any interest in them, has led me to pursue this course. Again and again has abuse been flung at me and as often have I let it go with silent contempt, preferring to obey the admonition, "when reviled revile not again." It may be that this steady refusal to reply to abuse has led to the belief that the silence is due, not to contempt, but timidity. Such an opinion would be a mistake and in order to prove it so I may be pardoned for taking a little notice of the last attack made upon me. The President having sent my name to the Senate for appointment as Receiver of the Land Office at Independence, P. A. Chalfant seizes that opportunity to assail me with a little more than usual virulence. It is to be presumed that my character as a man is not open to reproach, as Mr. Chalfant says nothing on that subject, but he is full of hints and surmises that I may have helped "to defeat a portion of every county Republican ticket for the last four, if not the last six years." I have not been in Inyo county six years. In 1884 an election was held soon after I came here. Then my acquaintance in the county was very limited; I took no part in the county convention or subsequent canvass, and on election day was away from home, returning just in time to vote the Republican ticket before the polls closed. Upon the county election of 1884 I had no more influence than that of my single vote. The history of my connection with the election of 1886 may be told in the same words. In 1888 my neighbors requested me, and even pressed me strongly, to go into the county convention as a delegate. I declined because in my opinion there were many older settlers than myself capable of making good delegates, and whatever the honor might be they were better entitled to it than I was.

My connection with the Republican party began in early life, when its glorious principles and the grand struggle in which it was engaged won the enthusiastic support of every young, ardent and generous mind. During the terrible years of that gigantic struggle the only office I ever sought was where I could do best service for the preservation of our glorious Union and free institutions. No man could be on the same ship with the gallant Admiral Porter during those years without doing some service. The political principles adopted with enthusiasm in youth now rest upon better knowledge and riper judgment, and will be retained and maintained, with courtesy I hope, but certainly with a firmness that will yield no jot or tittle of the truth till I shall be called before the unerring Judge of all to give an account of my whole life, politics included. During the time I have been editing the INDEPENDENT the paper has steadily advocated every great and good measure favored by the Republican party, more especially what I regard as the cardinal principles, protection for American working people and the preservation of the public land for American citizens. But all this without rant and blackguardism that never converts an opponent into an adherent, yet never fails to disgust the wise and discerning. The men who placed my name before the President for appointment to office had knowledge of my character as a man and as a Republican many years before I was ever heard of in Inyo county. Most sincerely do I beg pardon of the public for saying so much about myself, and I think I can safely promise never to repeat the offense, no matter what the provocation. In Inyo county, where the facts are known, my conviction is strong that pardon will be granted. And now a few words for my assailant:

From 1870 up till about 1883, P. A. Chalfant conducted, or was connected with, the INYO INDEPENDENT. The files of the paper for all those years are now in my possession. The columns might be searched in vain for anything that might instruct the reader that the greatest war recorded in history had been conducted by the Republican party and brought to the most successful conclusion of any war ever waged on earth. Silent as the grave are the columns of the paper during those years on all connected with the glorious deeds of the men who freely gave life itself in the defense of freedom. On the living issues during the same time in which the Republican party was striving ever to advance the cause of civilization and our own National prosperity the paper is as dumb as an oyster. In short, during all the time that Mr. Chalfant conducted the INDEPENDENT there was nothing in the paper to prove that he had any political opinions whatever. It is notorious also that during all those years the Republican party of Inyo county had, with scarcely an exception, been regularly defeated at the polls till it had come to be scoffed at for its inability to elect a candidate for almost any office. Yet all this time the Republicans rolled up good majorities for State and National candidates at every election. So bad was the party management, so bitter the jealousies among the leaders, and so rancorous their mutual hatreds, that they openly accused each other of going out of convention and from that hour till the votes were cast laboring heart and soul to defeat the very candidates they had helped to nominate. During all those years Mr. Chalfant was an active counselor in the party. How far his influence may have tended to bring about the shameful defeat of the party during so many years can only be conjectured. Three years ago Mr. Chalfant was elected Assessor of Inyo county. When he took office he at once appointed a Democrat as his deputy and to this day maintains the same man in office. That deputy is so well known in the county that nothing more need be said about him. There is no word or act in the political career of Mr. Chalfant that can lead to any other conclusion than that he is a Republican by accident, an office-seeker by necessity, a dunce by decree of nature and a servile tool by inclination and deliberate choice. The office of Assessor was given him as an alms, and the way he has conducted it has excited anger and contempt over the whole county. I challenge him to publish the names of Republicans who have found fault with my nomination, and should he fail to do so he will stand before the public convicted of falsehood.

C. MULHOLLAND.

The Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles has re-elected Major E. W. Jones its President. The Chamber is a powerful organization and has already accomplished much, not for Los Angeles alone, but for the whole of Southern California. Its influence will at all times be given heartily in favor of any project for the benefit of Inyo county. Major Jones is a true gentleman, who gives much valuable time and great energy to the service of the public, and that without fee or reward other than the pleasure of doing good.

The working men of all labor interests generally of the United States have lost one of their truest and ablest friends in the death of William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania. From his entry into Congress in 1860 up until his death he was unceasing in his efforts in and out of Congress to build up and make prosperous every manufacturing interest of his country, and to promote the welfare of all working people. He was in the 75th year of his age.

What She Gave.

"Oh dear, I've nothin' to put in the box for foreign missions!" complained a little girl of our acquaintance. "No," said her friend, as she gave the little maid a caress, "but you are a little home missionary."

And was she not? She spent an hour that morning amusing her baby sister, who was cross with cutting teeth. She sewed up a tear in brother Ned's ball, and hunted up some twine for his kite string, and she did it with a smiling face, and not a word of being bothered.

Yesterday this little home missionary attended the door bell for Mary, the housemaid, and let her go to visit her sick child. Meantime she wrote a letter to her absent father, who was away on business, in which she told him all the home news in a frank, artless way, giving the man a thrill of loving pride and pleasure in his little daughter.

She listened to one of grandma's old stories, told many times before, with patient attention. She laughed just at the right time to please the old lady, and when it was ended, she said:

"That's one of your good old stories, grandma."

In many ways did this little maid help and cheer her mother. So, though she could not contribute to the aid of foreign mission, she gave what could to add to the happiness of those about her, and who can do better than that?—Youth's Companion.

Home, Sweet Home.

The western farmer, with his hundreds of acres of new and fertile soil, looks with contempt upon the small and often sterile farms that are to be found in some parts of New England.

The owner of a western farm of 800 acres, nearly all of it under cultivation, who was visiting in Maine, sent a letter home in which he expressed his mind freely as follows:

"Here in this country they call two acres of ground, six hens and an old rooster a farm, and half the time one acre of the ground is graveyard. Give me old Kansas every time."—Youth's Companion.

Imitation Wines.

We have never yet heard of a wine merchant quixotic enough to deal avowedly in "imitation wines," says a London journal, or even to inform his customers that the champagnes and clarets, sauternes and burgundies with which he supplies them at so many shillings a dozen, were imported into France for conversion from Spain, Italy, Hungary, Greece, or even far California. It is still less agreeable, from the purchaser's point of view, to reflect that these so called wines were manufactured of all sorts of heterogeneous ingredients at Hamburg, the headquarters of continental falsification—a city in which more "vin de Bordeaux" is annually produced than in the whole department of the Gironde, just as more "Havanas" are fabricated than go to three times the entire yield of all the Cuban tobacco plantations.

With respect to these malpractices, heavy charges, we regret to say, only too solidly founded on fact, have of late been brought against the wine trade, by persons manifestly well acquainted with the nefarious maneuvers in which growers and shippers, importers and retailers alike, are leagued together with the common purpose of defrauding the consumer. Their victim being the only honest man connected with the whole transaction—that is, if he pays his wine bill—is necessarily at the mercy of so formidable a hostile coalition, and is fore condemned, so to speak, without benefit of clergy, to exchange good money for worthless wares, deliberately palmed upon him under false pretenses.—Boston Herald.

Another Discouraged Man.

He waded through the snow up the front steps and rang the door bell. And when the servant girl answered his ring, he said:

"I must see the lady herself on very important business."

The lady appeared, and he continued.

"Madam, can I contract with you to clean off this snow?"

"Why—I—how much do you want?"

"Only twenty cents."

"Well you may clean it off."

"Thanks. Have you a snow shovel?"

"There's one in the shed I believe."

"Thanks. Is there a boy in the neighborhood whose services I could secure?"

"For what?"

"To clean off the snow, ma'am. I am a contractor—not a laborer. And, ma'am, it is my rule to begin bossing only in the morning. If you can wait until to-morrow I'll be around at an early hour. My rule is to collect in advance, ma'am, and if you happen to have a bit of cold turkey and a cup of coffee and an old suit of clothes I shall feel under many obligations."

She shut the door on him and he went off declaring that it was another evidence that honesty and industry didn't pay in this community.—Detroit Free Press.

A young man, looking into the grave in which the mortal remains of his father were being covered from human sight said: "I shall never think of my father being there." That was a good thought. We do not bury the essential part of humanity. That survives and lives elsewhere as really as it once lived in the body.—Independent.

Estate of H. J. Hartshorne, deceased—Time for hearing order to show cause postponed.

DIED.

SMITH—At Stockton, January 9th, 1890, George F. Smith, a native of Kentucky, aged 66 years.

—Deceased was brother-in-law to Mr. A. N. Bell of Independence. He came to California many years ago and spent the rest of his life in the State. He had been in poor health a long time before his death. His widow, one son and two daughters survive him.

Mr. W. S. Enos went north on Thursday morning on his way to Sacramento.

John Lewis got home last Monday from a two months visit to San Francisco.

There is some snow all the way from Haiwai down Little Lake Canyon to Ninemile Station.

A little stir was caused by the bursting of a water pipe in the Court House yard yesterday afternoon.

Miss Laura McMurry came down from Big Pine and made a visit to Independence early in the week.

It is said that on Eastern Nevada ranges cattle are offered for sale at from seven to ten dollars a head.

There is good pasturage all over Owens Valley for stock, but in some enclosed pastures the springs have frozen up and cattle suffer from scarcity of water.

The determination of the people to have honest dealing with coinage appears to be having some weight. Silver is gaining a little, 96¼ being a late quotation.

It is worth while repeating that Mr. W S. Enos, of Independence, has two young stallions of Palo Alto stock. One is sired by Gen. Benton and the other by Fallis, 2:23, by Electioneer.

Senator Mitchell, of Oregon, introduced a bill last Monday to prohibit the coming of Chinese into the United States whether they are subjects of the Chinese Empire or otherwise. This is what is needed.

Parties knowing themselves to be in debted to me for work done are respectfully requested to call and settle immediately as I intend leaving town for a time. On my departure February 1st all my accounts will be placed in the hand of an attorney for collection. A. J. DAVIS.

Report comes from Pioche that a great force of men and teams is at work on the extension of the Salt Lake railroad. It is not expected that the road will run direct to Pioche but that a branch will be built from the main line to that place.

The Kern county Californian is confident of speedy and great prosperity for that county. This faith is founded upon the fact that the people are united heartily to promote public improvement. Any county in California where the people will join in right good earnest and work together can be made prosperous.

At the Alta mine, Virginia City, last Monday, James Kelton was hurt so badly that his death was expected. He went into a drift to examine a charge of giant powder that had hung fire. The blast exploded, blowing out both eyes and tearing off one arm of the unfortunate man.

The famous trotting stallion Bell Boy was burned to death last Friday at Versailles, Kentucky. His owners paid $51,000 for him and are said to have refused $100,000 for him recently. Bell boy was bred at Palo Alto, being out of Beautiful Bells by Electioneer.

Bond-holders of Inyo county bonds are invited to read the notice published in another column. The Supervisors give notice that the bonds must be refunded at five per cent. interest per annum or the principal and interest will be paid and the bonds cancelled.

M. H. Bush is in from Saline Valley. He and others interested with him have located about three thousand acres of borax land. He reports that Conn & Trunio have at their place about one hundred and forty tons of borax ready for shipment. There is about two feet of snow on the road over the mountains and no hauling can be done for the present. Mr. Bush says the weather in Saline Valley is very pleasant.

There will be no train to-day because of snow on the White Mountains south of Belleville. Telegrams from the north say it is doubtful if there will be any train south before Monday. There is the worst blockade on the C. & C. road since the line was built. The officers of the road are doing all they can to keep trains running.

Snow away up north prevented the down train of Monday from getting through. This is the only time so far this winter that our trains have not come through regularly on the Carson and Colorado road. All the other roads over the Pacific Coast have suffered severely and had great interruption of trains except the C. & C. road.

A good deal of complaint is made about water being allowed to run upon the roads and freeze. Just how to remedy the matter is another question. The water is in the hills and must come down. At night the creek channels are filled with ice and during the day the water spreads. The evil is of short duration and a little care will prevent accidents.

In 1887 Miss Kennedy was discharged from her position as principal of a school in San Francisco. She entered suit to regain her position. The case was carried to the Supreme Court and judgment has been granted in her favor, restoring her to the position and granting her pay for the whole time, amounting to about $5,000. The Court says a teacher against whom no charges can be brought cannot be dismissed.

A Dangerous Adventure.

Last Wednesday evening Henry Levy had a dangerous adventure. He went to the station with his stage to meet the down train. The train was stopped by a washout about four miles above the station; the train was some hours late before reaching the washout; it was a very dark night and one of the trainmen went to the station and reported the washout and consequent delay. There were several passengers on the train and Mr. Levy and Jerry Mairs, who was at the station with the Norman House stage, started for the train to bring in the passengers, as the delay was likely to continue several hours. Mr. J. Willett was at the station, and as he knows the country thoroughly Mr. Levy asked him to go along as guide. This Mr. Willett consented to do and took the lines and drove the team. About three and one-half miles above the station ice and water were encountered. Mr. Willett expected to get out of this very soon and drove on. But at every step the water was getting deeper and soon the team was stalled. The horses were urged and struggled a little, but gave up directly and refused to make any further effort. It was then discovered that the tugs had got loose; the wagon-tongue was freed from the neck-yoke and was jammed in the mud and the wagon was immovable in a forward direction Jerry Mairs was following and had been warned in time and he managed to get his team turned and went back. Mr. Levy saw what appeared to be solid ground a short distance ahead of the team; he got out of the wagon and plunged into the water and ice breast deep. He wallowed through till he found what he had supposed was dry ground but found it was a field of ice instead. He got upon the ice and kept moving toward the train, which was not far away. Presently the ice broke and he went under in water and mud. He was now in a very dangerous predicament but managed to crawl from under the ice and get on top of it again. Just then the bell began to ring and the train was about to start. Mr. Levy called loudly for help. Assistant Superintendant Laws, who was on the train, heard the cries and held the train. With several of his men Mr. Laws took lanterns and started for where he heard the cries. He and his men plunged through the water and ice breast deep till they reached Mr. Levy, who was now in a helpless condition. They took him up and with much difficulty carried him to the train. Here he was stripped of his wet and frozen garments and vigorous efforts made for his relief. In the mean time the train was on the way to the station, and by the time it got there Mr. Levy was able to get into a wagon and go home. He certainly owes his life to the exertions of Mr. Laws and his men. After Mr. Levy left his own wagon Mr Willett managed to get one of the horses free from it; this horse he mounted and rode back to dry land. The other horse was not got free from the wagon till near midnight. Mr. Levy is now all right and his horses do not appear to be any the worse for their rough trip.

The Horse Business

Parties who have recently taken horses from Independence to the west side of the mountains have had a good deal of difficulty in effecting sales and many of the animals remained yet unsold at last reports. This has given rise to the impression that the horse market is duller and prices lower than ever before. A man who has been several years in the business and understands it thoroughly gives his views on the subject as follows: He says the demand for horses is no less now than for several years past, nor is there any reason why it should be so. The settlement of the San Joaquin Valley is steadily increasing and with increased area of land worked there must be increased demand for horses. More horses have been taken from Owens Valley recently and the actual condition of the market is better understood by more of our horse raisers. This condition is not at all what some of them had been induced to believe by the reports some others had made of sales effected from time to time. Hence disappointment and the belief that the market is unusually dull. This gentleman goes on to say that if we would be successful in the business of raising horses we must improve our stock. It would be easier, he says, to sell fifty span of fine, stylish carriage horses at a thousand dollars a span than to sell the same number of inferior animals not worth more than a tenth of that sum. But to accomplish such a sale the animals must weigh not less than twelve hundred pounds each; they must be fine travelers, of good color, perfect throughout, well broken to harness and free from vices. It would pay far better to raise two or three spans of such horses each year than to raise a large band of animals that can only be got rid of with difficulty, and often not sold at all until they have eaten their heads off in expenses taking care of them. As already said these are the opinions of a man who thoroughly understands the business of marketing horses and are well worth attention. He says that at present there is an abundance of feed all over the country west from Walker's Pass, and over the San Joaquin Valley, where horses can be pastured with very small expense.

A Valuable Property.

In December, 1888, the City of Los Angeles gave to certain parties a franchise and a strip of land along the river within the limits This was done on the representation of the parties to whom the franchise was given that within a year work would be commenced and pushed ahead on building a railroad to Salt Lake. It afterwards appeared that the applicants for this franchise were but sharp speculators, who had managed to secure those privileges and expected to reap a large profit without spending any money by selling out to such railroad companies as might wish to enter Los Angeles, and would make them the best offer for their franchise and strip of land. Those rights and privileges had been granted conditionally; and as the parties failed to comply with the conditions the City has declared the grants forfeited and resumed possession of its own. The franchise and land will soon be wanted by some of the roads now approaching Los Angeles, and they will be willing to pay a large sum for what had been given away.

Quite As Bad.

The awful effects of the mystic grip of Masons was nothing to it. Addressing the "deil" Burns says:

"When Mason's mystic word and grip,
In storms and tempests raise you up,
Some cock or cat your rage maun stop,
Or strange to tell,
The youngest Brother ye wad whip,
Aff straught to hell!"

Neither sacrifice of cock or cat can serve young or old, brother or sister, from the clutches of the devil that has now got a "grip" on nearly everyone. Sneeze and cough, groan and grunt, are now nearly universal, and the miserable plague is equal to "the hell o' a' diseases," the toothache, that tortured Burns so severely.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Eastside canal overflowed last Wednesday about three miles above Independence station. The railroad was washed out a little and the down train delayed about two hours and a half. The damage was trifling.

Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Moffett returned from below at the beginning of the week. Mrs. Moffett had been visiting at San Diego and Mr. Moffett went to meet her at Mojave with a carriage. They had a cold trip home to Georges Creek across the desert.

The Carson and Colorado railroad is reported clear of snow over the mountains and free from obstructions to Dayton. Delay of mails and travel is caused by obstruction on the V. & T. and Central Pacific roads.

Mr. N. G Fairman is in from Panamint. He reports that camp as doing almost nothing at present. The road down Panamint Canyon is badly washed out about two miles below the town. There is very little snow on the Argus mountains; he crossed that range by the Minnietta trail and had no difficulty. He reports Darwin as being very quiet, nothing doing except at the Defiance and Lucky Jim mines. He will get supplies and start for Panamint to-morrow or next day.

For the year 1889 the fees and licenses collected by the Sheriff and Tax-Collector amounted to $8,439.25. This is greater by $2,030.44 than the collections made in any other year since the Salary Law went into operation. When it is remembered that business has been very dull during the year and that less concerns that require a license have been in operation than in other years the showing is most creditable to Sheriff Eldred and proves how faithfully he has done his duty in this direction.

The Belfast Spider has been walloped at last. On Monday an Australian named Murphy knocked him out after a hard fight of four een rounds. During twelve rounds the Spider had the fight his own way and the defeat of Murphy seemed certain. But in the thirteenth round Murphy seemed to get new life and knocked Weir down eight times in succession. The last round was short. Murphy knocked Weir down with great force and that settled it. Murphy's weight when he entered the ring was six pounds lighter than Weir, who weighed 124½ pounds.

IS THE NAME.

LOOK OUT FOR IT!

He Was Thoughtful.

"Can you furnish bail in the sum of $200?" was asked of a prisoner in the police court the other day.

"Yes, I suppose I could, but"——

"Who will go on your bond?"

"I was going to say that the president of the United States would probably be only too glad to, but I hate to bother him with such a trifle. I'll"——

"Get some one else?"

"No, I'll go to jail. This is Mr. Harrison's busy day, and I don't want to disturb him."—Detroit Free Press.

VALUABLE PAPERS.

Precious Finds that are Sometimes Discovered in Old Paper and Rags.

Dealers in paper stock often make remarkable finds among the rags and waste paper in which they deal. Rare books are frequently found, letters and deeds of value, and even in one instance a large stuffed alligator.

John C. Stockwell, who invented the very familiar sign reading "O I C, Highest Cash Prices Paid," etc., informed a reporter that he has frequently found letters from Presidents of the United States and prominent politicians in his stock.

"I found once," said he, "a letter which compromised the patriotism of one of the greatest statesmen in this country. It was in relation to an affair in which he and a great editor were involved. I would not like to divulge their names. Another remarkable find was the parchment deed for a whole town near Troy, signed by the Indians. But perhaps my most valuable discovery were the written records of the first Continental Congress, in the handwriting of Robert Morris and George Thompson. They are now in the library at Washington. Rare books are found so often that little notice is taken of it. I have found the first edition of the history of New Jersey, rare editions of Cotton Mather's works and Poor Richard's Almanac, published by Benjamin Franklin during his early history. It seems strange that so many curiosities of real value should be allowed to find their way here, but they come from the most enlightened people. Why, just look at the case of the finding of Madame Jerome Bonaparte's letters to her father, Mr. Patterson, of Baltimore. His daughter, by her romantic marriage, became a beauty, wit and queen in the first aristocratic circles of Europe, and yet it does not appear that her letters written to her father were very much valued. For years they remained undiscovered in an old lumber room in the old Patterson mansion on South street, Baltimore, after which they passed into the hands of an old junk dealer for a trifling sum. Sold for old paper, you know. The junk dealer in turn disposed of them to a paper dealer, who fortunately discovered their real value."

Another gentleman, at one time occupying the old British prison on Rose street as a ware-house, tells the following curious tale: "A gentleman once came to our store with a piece of hand-made water marked paper and offered a large sum if we could match him the water mark. It was a deed to a large piece of property in St. Louis, and he wished to prove it a forgery. If he could arise in court and by displaying a similar water mark prove that its peculiar character did not argue the age of the paper he hoped to win his case."

This calls to mind the will case undertaken by a celebrated lawyer some time ago in this country. The discovery was made by accident that the date of the water mark, which can be seen in all cases by holding it up to the light, was several years subsequent to the date of the will, proving conclusively that the will was a forgery.—*N. LIMEKILN CLUB.

Brother Gardner's Advice to a Member Who is About to Visit Canada.

"Brudder Glucose Smith," said the president, as the triangle ceased its tinkling and the meeting was declared open, "I am giben to understan' dat you am gwine away to visit a furreign kentry."

"Yes, sah; I'ze gwine ober to Canada."

"Werry well; de change of sights an' smells will probably do you good. I'ze glad to see you go, but I wants to say a few words to you right now and yere. In de fust place, don't emagine dat de hull United Staits am gwine to hold it's breat while you are gone, or be perched on de pedal of anxiety till you git back. Seberal men ob your size kin eben take de steamer fur England widout seriously blockin' de wheels of bizness or throwing a State into confusion. Dis may seem strange to you, but it am, nevertheless, a cold fack.

"Secondly, doan' go away feelin' dat you am de sole representative of dis kentry, an' dat you has de dignity of de United States to maintain. If you hev sich a feelin' you won't dare eat onions nor drink buttermilk. Jist keep right down on de ground 'mong common folks, an' a fall won't be so apt to break yer neck.

"Thirdly, doan' find fault wid de people bekase deir customs an' habits differ from ours. It would be quite accordin' to Hoyle fur you to go over to Canada an' claim dat all you saw was fifty y'ars behind us Yankees, but doan' do it. Not one of 'em would believe you in de fust place, an' in de next you might hev great trouble in provin' your assertions.

"Fo'thly, fur Heaven's sake doan' go to braggin' about yer kentry an' its wonderful resources, inventions, wealth an' enterprise. A good deal of all dis kin be offset by sartin facks dat we had better keep to ourselves. Fur instance, our fools, lunatics an' drunkards am increasin' a good deal faster dan our wealth, an' dar isn't a thousand public officials in de hull kentry who am entirely cl'ar of suspicion. Jist keep yer brag to yerself, walk around as a private individual an' you'll come home pleased with your trip. Dat's all, Brudder Smith, an' de seckretary will make you out a card o' membership dat will pass you into any prayer meetin' dat you happen to come across."—Detroit Free Press.

—A tricycle cab has been licensed by the London authorities and is picking up what patronage it can with a view to general introduction. Women like it because they can get in and out without soiling their dresses on the muddy wheels, and there is easy communication with the driver. It is still enough of a novelty to be generally stared at.

—An acute Cincinnati reporter employed a bootblack to go into a secret council meeting, give the mayor a shine and listen to all that was said.

—An Albany physician says that the most curious prescription he ever gave to a patient was one he prepared for a lady. It was "stop walking up and down stairs." The only way this prescription could be taken was by changing her house, as she lived in one of the three-story and basement houses so peculiar to Albany architecture. Her husband secured a roomy cottage of two stories, and within a year the invalid's health was almost completely restored.

ABOUT MASSAGE.

A Popular Modern Hygienic Exercise Which Was Practiced Ages Ago.

Massage as a hygienic agent was practiced from the earliest times and is probably as old as surgery itself, or, as it would be more exact to say, as old as mankind. The word is derived from the Greek "to knead" and the Arabic "to press softly." A Chinese manuscript, the date of which is three thousand years before the Christian era, contains an account of operations similar to those of the present day; friction, kneading, manipulating, rolling—all the procedures now grouped together under the name of massage. The translator of this curious record, a French missionary at Pekin, finds it to include all the characteristics of an ancient scientific mode of treatment; and it has been wittily remarked that however it may rejuvenate those who submit to its influence, the wrinkles of time can not be removed from its own ancient visage. With the Egyptians, Greeks and Romans a form of massage was the common accompaniment of the bath, and was used as a luxury, as a means of hastening tedious convalescence, and to render the limbs supple and enduring. Rubbing and anointing were some times done by medical practitioners themselves or by the priests, or some times by slaves. Herodicus, one of the masters of Hippocrates in the fifth century B. C., first proposed gymnastics as a cure for disease. He was the superior officer of the gymnasium at Athens, and by compelling his patients to undergo various exercises and to have their bodies rubbed is said to have lengthened their lives, insomuch that Plato reproached him for protracting that existence in which, as years advanced, they could have less and less enjoyment. He himself, by the practice of his own remedies, attained the age of one hundred. The earliest definite information regarding massage comes from Hippocrates, who says: "The physician must be experienced in many things, but assuredly also in rubbing; for things that have the same name have not always the same effects, for rubbing can bind a joint that is too loose, and loosen a joint that is too rigid." He also used the word anatripsis, the process of rubbing up, and not down, although not understanding the reason of it, as it was not till five hundred years later that Galeen pointed out that the arteries were not filled with air, as their name would seem to imply. Asclepiades was probably not far wrong when he founded his school at Rome on the belief that diet, bathing, exercise and friction should keep the body without disease; and Cicero affirmed that he owed as much of his health to his anointer as he did to his physician. Plutarch tells us that Julius Cæsar had himself pinched all over daily as a means of getting rid of a general neuralgia. Celsus, at the beginning of the Christian era, advised that rubbing should be applied to the whole body, "when an invalid requires his whole system to be replenished;" and Pliny availed himself of a mode of treatment which was evidently much in fashion in his day, and derived so much benefit from the remedy, that he obtained for his physician, who was a Jew, the privileges of Roman citizenship. It is related of the Emperor Hadrian that one day, seeing a veteran soldier rubbing himself against the marble at the public baths, he asked him why he did so. The veteran answered: "I have no slave to rub me." Whereupon the Emperor gave him two slaves and sufficient to maintain them. It is quaintly added to this story that the next day several old men rubbed themselves against the wall in the Emperor's presence, when perceiving their object, he shrewdly directed them to rub one another.—Chambers' Journal.

FATAL THIRTEEN.

How a Venerable Superstition was Substantiated in a Cruel Manner.

"Yes," said a man, who in company, with a party of friends, was engaged in conversation, "thirteen is a very unlucky number."

"I have been brought up to think so,' replied a skeptical fellow, "but I have never seen any thing to substantiate the superstition."

"I have," said the first speaker.

"Nonsense."

"No, it is a fact. Some time ago there were thirteen of us assembled in a room. Every one seemed to feel that something was going to happen and a strange solemnity settled upon the party. In fact, so deeply were we impressed that two of the company got down on their knees and prayed."

"Was there no one with nerve enough to make fun of such foolishness?"

"No, sir. Instead of making fun we stood with bowed heads."

"Well, what came of it? Did any thing happen to either of you?"

"Yes, sir; less than an hour later one of our party was a corpse."

"What!"

"Yes, one of the men who had prayed died within an hour. He seemed to know that his time was approaching, for an expression of resignation had come over his face."

"Died of apoplexy or something of that sort, eh?"

"Well, no. The attending physician gave it as his opinion that he died of a sudden ailment of the neck, hemporopelia I think he said. The sheriff, it appeared to me, was the immediate cause of his death.—Arkansaw Traveler.

Telegraphed the Important Part.

"Mr. Dusenberry, did you mail my letter?"

"My dear, I lost it."

"Oh, you careless fellow! It was to Aunt Emily, and was of the utmost importance."

"You mean the postscript was?"

"Yes."

"So I thought. Well, I remembered what the postscript was, and telegraphed it to her."—Philadelphia Call.

—Moose are becoming numerous in Maine, as a result of well-enforced game laws.

—It is said that Puget Sound has 1,800 miles of shore line, and all along the line, miles and miles farther than the eye can reach, is one vast and almost unbroken forest of enormous trees. The supply is so vast, that although the sawmills have been working up 500,000,000 feet of lumber taken out of the forest every year for the past ten years, the spaces made by these inroads seem no more than garden patches.

INDIANS FOUND THE CURE.

It is well known in the materia medica that the greatest remedies are compounded from the juices extracted from natural herbs. The humble child of the forest, whose untutored mind knew nothing of our advanced medical science, has nevertheless been instrumental in teaching the great doctors of this age the elementary principles of their profession. Nature and nature's God has always cared for her suffering children and provided a balm to heal all the curses that afflict mankind. The knowledge of the means come in a natural way. When the Sierra Chemical Company in this city first placed on the market their celebrated Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure, they knew it to be a wonderful discovery which came directly from the Pute Indians. It was submitted to the test of practical physicians and reduced to a formula by chemical analysis. The good results of the medicine are shown by the testimonials that are constantly being received at their office, 2124 Mission street, San Francisco, and are being published daily.

LUCKY MEN.

Mariano and Apolinario Romero Draw $15,000.

We have referred in previous issues of this paper to the lucky holder of a ticket in The Louisiana State Lottery which recently drew $15,000. It is generally supposed that the holder of this ticket was Senor Mariano Romero. An interview with that gentleman develops the fact that the ticket was the joint property of two brothers, Mariano and Apolinario Romero—native California gentlemen both well and favorably known to the people of this city and vicinity.

The are both married men, sober, industrious, hard working and economical. Mariano is a man of about fifty-five years. He has a wife with no children of his own but with three that are his by adoption. Apolinario Romero is about forty-four years old, with a wife and eleven children. The elder Romero has a farm of one hundred and sixty acres of land in Montecito; the younger brother has fifteen acres in the same place, but with a mortgage of $3,000 on it. The mortgage was just about due and it seemed as if the land would have to be given up for the debt. Then came the news of their lucky lottery ticket and immediately following came the money. It seemed almost as if the money had fallen from heaven to save the little home and provide for the eleven children.

Said Mariano: "A few months ago the mountain fires swept down over my ranch. I lost house, barn, wagons, crops, harness and even my wearing apparel. All I had left was the land. I was virtually destitute."

Said Apolinario to the writer to-day: "I was really very hard up and things looked blue to me and my family. But that money has come. I have paid off my mortgage and every dollar I owe and—now I am a money lender myself. My brother and myself are capitalists."

It seems these men had occasionally purchased Louisiana State Lottery tickets before, but money was hard for them to get and they said they had made up their minds to buy just one ticket more and then quit entirely. "Probably we have purchased in all ten dollars worth of tickets," said Mariano Romero. "Shall we buy more tickets? Oh yes, we shall each have tickets in every drawing. We have two tickets already purchased for the next drawing."

Investigation shows us that the $15,000 drawn by these men have done a world of good. Both men owed considerably around in this neighborhood. But as soon as the money came they paid up every dollar of their indebtedness and have money left. They are both now above want and are as really rich as if they had ten times the amount. We are truly glad of their success, and believe they will take good care of what remains of their fortunate lottery ticket.—Santa Barbara (Cal.) Independent Nov. 9.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the living membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Micro-scopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. With the praises of Hood's Sarsaparilla, soon after this medicine was offered at the drug store of C. I. Hood & Co. Everybody was astonished when they heard of the cure of Miss Sarah Whittier. For many years she had suffered more than can be told, from scrofulous sores. For two years she was unable to be out of the house and for six months was obliged to use crutches to get round her room. When she began to take Hood's Sarsaparilla she had 13 scrofula sores on her body, was thin in flesh, with little appetite, and unable to sleep nights on account of pain and nervousness. Before she had taken the whole of a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla there was a great change for the better, and after a time the sores had all healed and she was in general good health. All this was ten years ago and the benefit from Hood's Sarsaparilla has continued ever since. Miss Whittier now resides at No. 25 Branch Street, Lowell, Mass. We will send full particulars of this case to all who desire.

BAYSIDE'S LUCK.

A Fortune for a Small Investment.

It may be true that much of the intensity and excitement which at one time was so closely identified with the Pacific coast mines, has in a measure died out, and the days of making fortunes by gold digging have passed away.

Still "Dame Fortune" lingers in our midst, and we hear occasionally of some lucky individual having successfully won her smiles. With the prospect of having railroad communication with the outer world within a short space of time, real estate in Eureka must double, and perhaps treble itself.

Now, it requires considerable capital to invest in property, and consequently the opportunity will be open to the chosen few only. For the thousands whose means are limited there are other chances for investment.

There are numerous cases of fortunes being made on a very small outlay. A short time ago a party of ten persons residing at Bayside, Humboldt county, California, decided to try their luck in the Mexican Lottery, having been tempted to do so by the liberal inducements held out. They invested $10 in the November drawing, and greatly to their delight and astonishment, one of their tickets 63,616, carried off one-fourth of the second capital prize $20,000 entitling them to $5,000.

This was a splendid return for their modest outlay of $10.

The fortunate investors pocket a snug little sum of $500 apiece. It need hardly be stated that the lucky party often were overwhelmed with congratulations by their many friends, when the glad tidings were received. By a dollar investment in the Mexican Lottery a person may win $15,000—a small fortune.

The $5,000 prize, though the lottery is conducted in Mexico, was paid in full in U. S. gold coin in San Francisco, Cal., to the Bank of California on Friday, Nov. 22d, 1889, who held the same for collection for the Humboldt Bank of California.

A Mr. Brink of Spring City, Nevada, held one-fourth ticket, No. 32,851, in November drawing, which drew the capital prize of $60,000, and the same was sent for collection through Wells, Fargo & Co's Bank of San Francisco, Cal., to the City of Mexico.

A CONCLUSIVE PROOF.

A Bank with a capital and surplus of $1,700,000, and with average resources of upwards of $4,350,000, must certainly be in a very flourishing condition due to the uniformly safe and legitimate character of its transactions, for a long series of years, that has won for it the entire confidence of our best business men.

The accompanying cut is from a photograph showing this machine at work. This most complete and powerful machine is rapidly coming into use wherever there is land to clear and its merits are known. It works on either standing timber or stumps. Will pull an ordinary grub in one and one-half minutes. Makes a clean sweep of 2 acres at a setting. A man, a boy and a horse can operate it. No heavy chains or rods to handle—steel wire rope being used instead. The crop on a few acres the first year will pay for the machine and have the machine and land clear, left. Farmers having timber land to clear cannot afford to be without one, much less to continue to pay taxes on rich land which yields them nothing, while they exhaust their cleared land by constant crops. In timber over six inches in diameter this machine will grub faster than six men can trim, and pile the brush. It will pay those interested in clearing land to investigate the merits of this machine. HOME-MAKING INSTINCT.

The Way In Which It Is Exemplified In Town and Country Women.

There was a pathetic story in an old school reader of a poor, homesick beaver that was captured on the shores of his native stream and carried off to a city by an experimenting naturalist. It was shut up in a room and given a piece of wood wherewith to amuse itself. Forthwith its natural instinct asserted itself; it began at once to construct a dam out of the materal supplied it, and labored for days industriously, if in vain. The world is full of women of this sort, except that the outcome of their efforts is more tangible than that of the animal intent upon dam-building. The cities, and even the country, are full of homes which women have contrived out of the meagerest materials. A man on a small salary accepts the dreary hall bed-room, fourth floor back, with dogged submission, considering his quarters part and parcel of his hard luck. Its dinginess grows dingier; old boots, soiled clothing, crumpled newspapers, burnt matches, and disreputable pipes intensify its dreariness, and the smell of stale tobacco-smoke is over it all. He looks at the dusty chaos hopelessly. He knows that every thing is at sixes and sevens, but the instinct to adorn and arrange is not born in him and he can only be helplessly miserable. Of course there are exceptions—to be studied on shipboard, in army quarters, and elsewhere where men have absolute sway. But there the cleanliness and precision are plainly exact. The general expression is not homelike, but reminds one of the regulated and supervised system which prevails in benevolent and penal institutions. The woman, as a rule, takes possession of her shabby apartment and immediately looks about her to see what improvements are practicable. The torn wall-paper is neatly mended; the carpet is patched or darned until the bad places "hardly show." A few yards of cretonne furnish pretty cushions, table covers, and curtains for the cupboard, where her cooking utensils are stowed away, and concealed. With a piece of pasteboard she contrives work basket and paper holder. The windows are washed and polished until they shine. Her few poor little treasures, prints and photographs, the bric-a-brac bought at the cheap counters of the great house-furnishing establishments are carefully arranged, and the place that before was dreary and shabby is converted into something decidedly attractive. It became a snug, cheery little nest, toward which the occupant hurries eagerly after the long day in which she has stood behind the counter, or plied her needle in the crowded work-room of a fashionable dress-making shop. It is here that she rests, reads and dreams those day dreams that fill the hearts of women of all classes and conditions.

The same instinct frequently manifests itself in new countries, after the wife joins her husband in the home to which he had preceded her. Floors are scoured, windows are neatly curtained, a bright rag carpet is made for the sitting-room floor, flowers bloom in the front yard and vines clamber over the front door, touches of sweetness and homely comfort springing up under her magical hand. It is to labor like this that women have devoted their minds and energy, and if their genius has not yet found expression in the highest forms of art and science, they have redeemed the waste places of the world and have made the wilderness blossom as the rose.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

ACUTE RHEUMATISM.

The Miasmatic Theory Recently Advanced by German Authorities.

To most practitioners acute rheumatism must appear essentially a personal or constitutional ailment occurring most readily under certain unfavorable conditions, such as fatigue, exposure, depression, with wet or cold weather. There is a disposition, however, among some physicians to regard it as dependent essentially on miasmatic conditions.

One of the latest expositions of this view is to be found in a paper read before the German Medical Society of New York by Dr. Leonard Weber. Dr. Weber considers it nearly proved by the labors of Immermann, Edlefsen, Friedlander and their pupils, that what he calls inflammatory rheumatism, and what is generally termed acute rheumatism, is not produced by taking cold, i. e., the refrigeration of the heated surface of the body, but that it belongs to the class of miasmatic infectious diseases assuming an epidemic-like character at certain times, in so far as we are apt to see a larger number of cases when there is decreasing rain and moisture, while with an increase of the same the number of cases is diminished. Among other points, he considers as nearly proved that rheumatism is also a house disease, the subsoil of houses in certain locations being infiltrated with the virus, which, after prolonged dryness, may be set free by the air currents carried into the apartments.

In masked forms of rheumatism there may be an absence of one or other of the main symptoms and of the polyarthritis. Neuralgia of the trigeminal, sciatic, spinal accessory or other nerves, with slight febrile movement, may be of a rheumatic nature, and yield to alkaline and salicylate treatment after other remedies have failed. Dr. Webster says that his records show that the greater number of his cases of polyarthritis rheumatica occurred in February and March, and again in the hot and dry summer months. We do not commit ourselves to the theory of the miasmatic or external origin of acute rheumatism.

By the way, Dr. Weber does scant justice to our own countryman, Dr. Maclagan, who must be chiefly credited with this theory, which, indeed, led him to the use of salicin. We incline strongly to the personal and constitutional theory of its origin. But it is well to keep all well-argued theories in view. It is satisfactory to note that Dr. Weber regards the salicylate of soda, which he gives generally with the bicarbonate, as standing in the foremost rank of valuable drugs with which modern chemistry has presented us.—Lancet.

THE ARIZONA KICKER.

Some of the Things Peculiar to Journalism in the West.

We extract the following from the last issue of the Arizona Kicker:

A DOUBLE HIT.—Last week certain folks who want to see us downed were chuckling because we were not invited to the grand autumn soiree given by Mrs. Judge Goldersleeve, of Jackass Heights. It was a social snub on us, we'll admit, but the aforesaid chuckling has ceased. It broke short off day before yesterday when the sheriff arrived from Omaha and tapped the judge on the shoulder and asked him how the business of cow stealing got along. We've had the biography of the judge in hand for some months. He robbed a post-office in Illinois, stole hogs in Iowa and embezzled from a toll-bridge in Indiana. On top of that he stole cows in Nebraska, and when his wife made cold mutton of us we went down to the telegraph office and dispatched the sheriff to come on. We think we are about even. It is not the policy of this paper, as we have often stated, to deplete our population by "giving away" our citizens, but no one must try any monkey-shines with us. We are here to stay.

HE STEPPED.—In our last issue we called attention to the fact that William Parton, familiarly known as "Bald-headed Bill," had succeeded in securing the nomination for alderman of the Second ward on the People's Reform ticket. We didn't go much on the reform business, to begin with, and we went considerably less on William. We kindly mentioned the fact to him that he was an old soaker, a man who never paid a debt, and that he escaped indictment for stealing the bridge funds by a flaw. In a brotherly way we asked him to step down and out, but instead of heeding our well-meant advice he came hunting for us with a shotgun. Then we had to exhibit certain documents to the good people to prove that William's true home was in State prison, and it was decided to get a move on him. Some one gave the snap away, however, and he was a mile or more away when the people called at his cabin and asked him to come out and play pendulum. We are heavy on genuine reform in politics, but we can't be made to believe that the way to begin it is to nominate a thief for office.

ALWAYS AHEAD.—We take pleasure in announcing to the public in this manner that we have established still another enterprise in connection with The Kicker. The New York World has its way of showing its enterprise, and we have ours. We haven't got fourteen Webb presses at work, nor can we afford to send an expedition to Africa—not yet. We have had for some time under one roof a newspaper office, a grocery, a feed store, a harness shop, a candy store and a glove factory. We have now added a butcher shop. While all these things will be run in connection with The Kicker, and by the same editorial staff, subscribers won't be obliged to take any thing but the paper. We leave others to do the bragging, but we think we can justly point with pride to this mammoth aggregation of business, all edited by one central head, and all steadily improving in genuine merit.

OUR WESTERN WAY.—We were one of three citizens who found our city recorder staving blind drunk the other night and helped him home, and because we had something to say, drunk as he was, of such conduct on the part of a city official, he has been blowing around that we are his enemy and want to down him. The truth of the matter is that he has been on a drunk for the last six months, and at no time in that period has he been fit for his official duties, but isn't that the case with all the rest of them? We've been fighting whisky ever since our first issue, but the town now drinks a barrel where it used to a gallon. We haven't an official in town who doesn't booze, and we propose next week to make one last effort. If they can't brace up we'll see that every one of them is sent for and taken back to serve out his unexpired sentence. We like the West and Western ways, but when every body, from the postmaster to the ten-pin marker, gets drunk on the same day a change of some sort is needed.

THE WEATHER.—Our subscribers have been both surprised and pleased at the way we have hit the weather for the last two weeks. We didn't expect to do so well in the start-off, as the only instrument we had was an old horse-shoe, a two-foot rule and a war map of the battle of Gettysburg, but we made no mistake. Our first prediction was that the following week would be cold, clear, cloudy, warm and variable, with possibly rain. We hit it even to the variable. She varied from a frost to such a hot night that every body kicked the quilts off. The rain didn't last but three days, but there was sufficient to let us out. Our second prediction also hit it pat. We predicted winds, calms, sunshine, clouds, high pressure over the Arctic Ocean, and low pressure around the mouth of the Amazon, with a considerable wobble between here and the Pacific. She wobbled. We got just what we expected, and from this out we are going ahead like a scared jack-rabbit hunting for cover. Watch our smoke.—Detroit Free Press.

—A bashful young man, of Wellsville, N. Y., recently offered a $5 silk umbrella to the young lady sending the best proposal of marriage. Points to be considered were composition, spelling, writing, brevity and reasons for wishing to be married. Maiden ladies over seventy-five were barred out.

HOW TO MAKE MAGNETS.

A Simple Process Which Any Intelligent Boy Can Master.

There are two general classes of magnets—electro-magnets and permanent magnets. The electro-magnet is active only when a current of electricity is passing around it; the permanent magnet, as its name indicates, retains its magnetism after the magnetizing agent is removed. Electro-magnets are always made of soft iron, while permanent ones are made of steel. An electro-magnet can be easily constructed as follows:

Procure from a blacksmith or from any source a small soft-iron horseshoe. Commencing just above the heelcork on one side, wind closely three or five layers of two inches' length of No. 22 insulated copper wire. Without cutting the wire, proceed spirally along the toe of the shoe, and then wind the same number of similar layers on the other end.

All the windings must be in the same direction in reference to the iron. If now the ends of the wire be connected with an electric battery, quite large pieces of soft iron—for instance, large nails or spikes—will be held up by the heelcorks, which act as pole pieces.

As soon as the battery is disconnected the spike will fall. This, however, would not be the case if the horseshoe was made of steel, for it would then, because of the passage of the electric current, have become a permanent magnet. To pass an electric current around a piece of steel is, indeed, the easiest way of making a permanent magnet.

To try it, wind several layers of the same wire used on the horseshoe around a lead-pencil. Then carefully remove the lead-pencil, and insert in the hollow coil left a common darning-needle, the head of which has been broken off, leaving about an inch of length.

Pass the current from the battery through the coil for a minute, disconnect and remove the needle, and it will be found to be magnetized. If it be drawn through iron filings or small tacks, they will adhere to it.—Boston Budget.

A New Use for Vaseline.

"The women have a new use for vaseline," observed a drug clerk as he jerked his thumb over his right shoulder in the direction of a well-dressed lady who was leaving the store after having made a purchase of the petroleum compound.

"What's that?"

"They are using it on their shoes now."

"On their shoes?"

"Yes, and the ladies must be given credit for having made a valuable discovery. The ingredients have a wonderful effect on fine leather, and it is fast taking the place of all the compounds manufactured for softening the shoes. Take a pair of shoes that have become stiff and uncomfortable by constant wear in the rain and apply a coat of vaseline, rubbing it in well with a cloth, and in a short time the leather becomes as soft and pliable as when it is taken from the shelves of the shoe dealer. Yes, indeed, this rainy weather has caused quite a boom in the vaseline trade."—Washington Post.

To Get Rid of Suckers.

J. W. Clark, of the Missouri Agricultural College, says: "The reason why sprouts or suckers grow at the base of the trunks of apple trees is that at the base of the tree, the collar, as it is called, just beneath the surface of the ground, adventitious buds are formed from which the suckers, or sprouts grow. If these are cut close to the ground, the stubs left beneath the surface will send up several sprouts in place of the one cut away, so that where the suckers are simply removed once during the season, instead of helping the case it is made worse. Cutting several times during the growing season will, if continued, destroy them; a better way is to remove the earth from the collar and roots near the trunk, to a depth of six or eight inches, and cut all shoots off close to the trunk from which they start, taking care not to leave a short stub, or new shoots will start from it. If the shoots can be pulled off, the work will prove fully as effective. Replace the earth about the tree again after the suckers have all been removed."

Is the Sun Inhabited?

Sir David Brewster makes the following remarks relative to the sun: So strong has been the belief that the sun can not be a habitable world, that a scientific gentleman was pronounced by his medical attendant insane because he had sent a paper to the Royal Society, in which he maintained that the light of the sun proceeded from a dense and universal aura, which may afford ample light to the inhabitants beneath, and yet be at such a distance aloft as not to be among them; that there may be water and dry land there, hills and dales, rain and fair weather, and that as the light and the seasons must be eternal, the sun may easily be conceived to be by far the most blissful habitation of the whole system. In less than ten years after this apparently extravagant notion was considered as a proof of insanity, it was maintained by Sir William Herschel, as a rational and probable opinion, which might be deducible from his own observations on the structure of the sun.—N. Y. Ledger.

It Was Raining.

Yesterday afternoon while the rain was pouring down a citizen left the postoffice to encounter an acquaintance who was also sheltered by an umbrella.

"Raining, isn't it?" queried the first.

"Hey?"

"Raining, isn't it?"

"I'd like to see you a moment," was the reply. "Come up stairs."

The two passed up, traversed the dark hall to its darkest corner, and then No. 2 turned on No. 1 with

"Do you take me for an infernal idiot?"

"Why, no, of course not."

"Do you suppose I'm carrying an umbrella around to keep the sun off at this time of year?"

"No."

"I'm carrying it to keep off the rain, am I not?"

"Of course."

"Well, then, it rains. You know it rains. Everybody in town knows it rains. Now, you go on and let people alone."

"But—but"—

"That's all. You let it rain. She knows her business. You just attend to your own affairs and let the weather alone. Good day, sir."

And he went clumping down stairs and left the other to follow at his leisure.—Detroit Free Press.

What She Would Do.

"I've brought Tommy with me. Yes," said Mrs. Flighty, meeting Mrs. Smythe in one of New York's biggest and most bewildering dry goods stores. "I don't often bring him, for I think there's great danger in having little children in one of these big shops or on the crowded streets. He wears a little medal with his name and the number of our residence on it, and I've taught him just what to say in case he should get lost, and I'd know just what to do myself. I'd keep perfectly calm and go right to police headquarters and give information there and then—why, where is the child? Tommy! where are you? Tommy, Tommy Flighty! Where did he go? Mercy on us, what could have become of the child? Did you see him? Tommy! Good heavens and earth! He'll be killed in this crowd! Oh, what shall I do? Tommy, Tommy! I'll go crazy if I don't find him this minute! Where can he be? Oh, I shall faint! I shall die if I have to go home without him! Police! Help! My child! My child! I shall never see him again! I know I shan't! It will kill his papa! Tommy, my child, my child! O—o—o—h!"

And while they were bringing her out of her faint, Tommy came from behind a counter, where he had crept in search of a pasteboard box.—Hat in Time.

HABITS OF FRENCHMEN.

One Respect in Which They Enjoy an Advantage Over Americans.

The habits of life, so far as regards eating, are better with our Parisian. England and America both transgress, one in the quantity, the other in the quality, of the food. The Briton feeds too heavily. He becomes plethoric and beefy. The exquisite rose tints on his daughter's cheek turn to patches of harsh color on the face of his wife, and his own rubicund visage suggests chronic congestion. Not content with heavy meals morning, noon and evening, there is a night supper, more or less profuse according as the good sense of the individual bends to or wrestles with custom. There is a good deal of tea drunk and coffee and a vast amount of strong ale and porter; which all serve to induce more appetite for solid food. A man can eat two slices of bread or meat with a glass or a cup of liquid accompaniment, where he could use but one without. So the effect is apt to be excess—certain excess over the necessary amount of nourishment, probable excess over the wholesome point.

In America it is not the amount—although our women as a rule with their sedentary habits use too much, especially at breakfast time—but the kind of food which makes the national deadly sin. Pies, cakes and hot biscuits, fried meat and doughnuts, pickles and preserves, bleach instead of reddening the blood; and except in some few districts, we are a nation of anemics. If the unfortunate stomach can sustain the injury done it by lack of proper nourishment, it succumbs to the habit of bolting. Meal time is a succession of gulps and swallows grudgingly snatched from time devoted to the routine of labor, as hurried as nervous haste and the preoccupation of business cares can make it, and wholly unavailing for ordinary purposes of mastication. The misused teeth decay and ruined digestion revenges itself in blanched cheeks, thinned hair and general prostration. If this is too vivid a picture for the better knowledge and higher civilization of our cities, it certainly is not so for the country districts, and it is these last which produce the people. Towns may be the nerve ganglions, but the country supplies their force.

The Parisian has changed all this. He begins the day with the slightest possible breakfast, leaving mind and body cleared, not weighted for action. After three or four hours' work has induced a healthy demand for food there comes a dainty and plentiful meal—two or three courses of meat, with a few vegetables, an omelette, bread and butter, fresh or prepared fruit. This answers to our lunch, and is usually served at noon or at one o'clock. Six hours later comes dinner. Soup always, often fish, four or five delicate and inviting preparations of meat, with a slight accompaniment of vegetables and some delicious sauce; a sweet and a dessert of fruit and cheese form the main points of this principal meal. Poor families will have less; richer people will offer greater variety, but ordinarily this scheme very slightly modified will represent the daily routine of a Parisian household.—Paris Cor. Boston Journal.

ON THE GRAND CANAL.

Early Morning Scenes in Venice—Market-Men on the Way to the Rialto.

The first sign of life on the Grand Canal in the early morning is the passing by of long barges laden with green vegetables and fruit from the low, flat island of Mazzorbo, and destined for the market at the Rialto. One such has passed as we write; its sail is of a rich Indian red with a dark blue tip, a fillet-work border running round it, and in its center a design in orange of St. George and the dragon. The big rudder is gaudily painted in green and white, and has a picture of the Madonna on the part that is above the water. The men who are poling the barge along add to the variety of color by one of them wearing a pink shirt and purple trousers. The whole thing, together with its green load, looks, as the first rays of the sun glint upon it, like a bit of a broken rainbow that has dropped into the canal and is drifting along on the eddies. Now comes a barge heaped up with coal, now one with bales of cotton for the factory lately established here. This is followed by another whose cargo of square white deal boxes is guarded by a soldier at each end of the boat, and the red flag that floats over it tells us that it is dynamite that is passing by. Of a more peaceable sort is the next that we notice. A small flat boat, hardly more than a curved board, is propeled by two tall, brown-robed figures, two Capuchin friars, who, with bare heads and sandaled feet and with cords girdling their waists, are off on a begging expedition, hoping to return with their Franciscan cane basket filled with good things for their monastery's faro. Presently a barca approaches the stone landing place beside our palace. This barca is a plainer sort of gondola, without its graceful, dignified steel prow. Out of it come, tumbling over each other, about fifty soldiers. An early-astir, itinerant seller of an Italian "Complete Letter Writer," with a quick eye to business who happens to come up, seizes the opportunity, and in a moment his bag is open. He pulls out a heap of books, and with ready wit reads a suitable sample of the contents of his book: "Letter from a soldier in Abyssinia to his brother in Italy." In an instant the soldiers are crowding round him, listening with interest, many producing the few coins with which they can become possessors of the little manual, which they scan eagerly for something to fit their own particular case as they are hurried away up the narrow lane.—Chambers' Journal.

Amy Meant the Other Kind.

"Mr. Dolley, give me a cent," said Amy's little sister, before Amy came down to the parlor.

"What do you want with it?" asked Mr. Dolley, much amused, as he handed her the coin.

"O, I don't want it; I only wanted to see if you had any cents, because sister Amy said this afternoon that you hadn't."—Yonowine's News.

WATER SCARCE IN COLORADO.

A Warning That Should Not Be Suffered to Pass Unheeded—Suggestions.

Colorado will be forced to follow in the footsteps of California in a communistic appropriation of the waters of the state for the use of its entire population. The drought of the present season, protracted through a period of three months, gives a warning that will not be suffered to pass unheeded. Colorado has even a scantier stock of water than California. The larger part of the state lies just east of the Rocky mountains, and the three rivers, South Platte, Arkansas and Rio Grade, which, with their affluents, water the country, are very insignificant streams—so small and shallow that in prolonged dry spells like the present they nearly lose their current.

Flume and ditch companies have tapped them at the base of the mountains, and drawn off the water to be sold in small streams to farmers for irrigation purposes. But this gives to the population nearest the mountains an advantage over those living further east, for it sometimes occurs in time of drought that, when the former are amply served, the river is nearly exhausted, and there is little water left for the people living lower down. In the present case, the South Platte, which runs through Denver, has been so shrunken in volume that it does not afford water enough for all purposes, and the state authorities have been forced to prohibit diversion of the water into ditches for irrigation, and allow it to be used only for drinking and stock watering. The great cattle herds are found in the eastern part of the state, at a distance from the heads of the streams, and if the streams are exhausted near the mountains by irrigating ditches and flumes, the cattle herds must suffer.

It seems to be the experience that as population, with its civilizing practices, multiplies in a new country, the rainfall diminishes; and there is not a doubt that, when the destruction of mountain forests in Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, New Mexico and Nevada shall have been completed, a scarcity of water will be a perpetual disadvantage, and the shrunken streams and lakes will have to be protected with jealous official care. Otherwise it is easy to imagine a drouth unusually protracted, in which the mountain streams, fed by snow water alone, would shrivel to rills, and the thousands of animals perish of thirst, and the populations themselves be forced to abandon the country. To prevent such a peril, the state will have to assume absolute possession of all water supplies, and hold and dispense them for the use of the people. In the course of time the population of Colorado will be a million, and when that day comes water will be a treasure to be husbanded and protected as jealously as it is in Arabia.—St. Louis Republican.

Heading Off a Prairie Fire.

A courier on a foaming mustang, followed by a herd of stampeding animals, has announced the coming of the fire, miles to windward, perhaps before even its smoke is visible. At the word "Fire!" every man on the settlement drops his work, catches his horse, seizes water buckets, blankets, ropes, cans of kerosene oil, plows, and whatever else may be of use in fighting the fire, and, throwing these into a wagon, dashes off to meet the danger. The probable course of the fiery cyclone being ascertained, a large force of men begin plowing a strip of land directly across it, for a "fire-break." Sometimes half a dozen plows, with four or more horses to each, are put simultaneously to work, turning up furrows with desperate energy.

On the windward or exposed side of this fire-break a counter fire is started by means of the ropes saturated with kerosene. This creeps along at a comparatively slow pace against the wind, to meet the greater one, which comes surging along, preceded by a scorching, furnace-like breath and a dense shower of gray ashes. On the other side of the plowed strip, toward the ranches, the grass is drenched with water, and men stand ready with wet blankets to put out the flying sparks as they alight. The rush of the approaching mass of flame and smoke is terrific. It fairly leaps ahead, 100 feet at a time, hissing, snapping and roaring as if it were laying low a forest. Suddenly it meets the back fire. The two rush together in a great billow of flame, which rises high in the air and goes out in dense black clouds of smoke. The tornado is checked, and the ranchers are saved.

This is what takes place when the work of the prairie firemen is successful. Sometimes, however, the flames, checked in front, rally and spread out anew at the sides, and continue their destructive course over more miles of prairie, until stopped by some river or desert place.—Frank Leslie's Illustrated.

Lightning in the Rocky Mountains.

The curious case of G. S. Edwards, who was struck by lightning while crossing Iron hill, at Leadville, Colo., on July 4, is attracting considerable interest among scientific men. After the flash, Mr. Edwards remained unconscious for fifteen minutes before receiving assistance. The lightning struck him on the left cheek, and after knocking out a number of his teeth passed diagonally across the breast to the right side. It then descended the body to the foot, emerging from the right boot. It passed entirely through the foot, leaving a hole similar to that made by a bullet. The clothing was torn into fragments, particles being found a distance of 200 feet. Both of the boots were entirely destroyed, and one of them carried sixty feet away.

The ground where the man was standing was torn up for a considerable distance. The course of the electric current along the body was marked by a black and red streak one and a half inches wide. The worst effect of the streak seems to have been on the lungs. A severe hemorrhage was produced, by which a quart of blood was lost. In addition to these injuries, the surface of the body was almost covered with blisters, the result of ugly burns. This, we believe, is the first authentic record of a person being injured by lightning at an elevation of 10,500 feet. It is remarkable such severe internal injuries were not followed by death.—Scientific American.

Dr. Douglas, Gen. Grant's Physician.

In a flying visit to New York the other day I saw Dr. Douglas, Gen. Grant's physician. The doctor has not fully recovered from the great physical and mental strain imposed upon him by his constant attention during the whole of the last nine months of Grant's life. The doctor's hands shake still as if they were palsied. But his general look is one of great gain. Several months ago a catarrhal trouble resulted in his stomach becoming poisoned with mucus that had been beyond the power of expectoration. He overcame the difficulty by introducing a rubber tube into his throat and the passage below. Through this tube he would pass warm water so as to cleanse out the alimentary canal and stomach before eating. By this process he has regained lost flesh, and to a degree his lost health.—Washington Letter.

A Slight Mistake in Reporting.

The Earl of Carnarvon at a banquet, in proposing the health of the clergy, said that "in these days clergymen were expected to have the wisdom and learning of a Jeremy Taylor." His lordship was next day reported to have said: "In these days clergymen were expected to have the wisdom and learning of a journeyman tailor."—The Argonaut.

FAME.

[Paul Hermes.]

"Better than aught is fame," he said;
"'Tis better than wealth or wine
To see the populace sway its head,
And to hear its shouts combine;

"Sweeter than kiss the bridegroom sips
Is the honey sweet of fame,
When the grateful nation opens its lips
To utter a hero's name."

Trampled by hoofs and heavy feet
With power and blood beat out,
His body they found on the foe's retreat,
Where the bullets thickest rained.

Silently through the crowded street
The muffled coffin came;
Not a word was said—hearts quicker beat;
And that was the hero's fame.

AUTHORS ON EXHIBITION.

Personal Appearance of Noted Men of the Pen—Rather Good-Looking.

[New York Cor. Philadelphia Record.]

It was not so much to hear the authors read as to see what they looked like that packed the Madison Square theatre and you may be sure that every lady present carried an opera glass. The authors made a good showing, and felt quite proud of them. Mr. Curtis, with his English side whiskers and iron-gray hair, parted in the middle, is always an elegant person to look at, and Julian Hawthorne is decidedly picturesque. He has his father's black curling hair, striking eyes and fierce mustache. He is large and well made, and a very good looking fellow. Will Carleton looks exactly as you would expect Will Carleton to look. He is the perfect type of brother Jonathan, except that he hasn't the hollow cheeks of that typical individual; but he used to have when I first saw him he was very hatchet-faced, but now his cheeks are rounded out. He still, however, wears the tuft of hair on his chin, and the old-fashioned necktie, which our parents called a stock.

Mr. Howells whose stories are the delight of the ladies, is short and fat, wears his hair banged on his forehead, has a bristling mustache and wears eye-glasses when he reads. He is well dressed for an author—as a usual thing authors have not much regard for the tailor's art—and I think that his admirers were satisfied with his appearance. Professor Boyesen is a Norwegian, and while he doesn't look quite the Viking, wears a tawny beard and mustache, and has a ruddy complexion and light blue eyes. Mr. Bunner is the last man one would pick out as the editor of Puck. He looks much more like a dainty student. He is a young man, with black curling hair, brushed till it shines like a looking-glass, and he wears little black side-whiskers, cut close to his cheeks and eye-glasses.

John Boyle O'Reilly is called the most picturesque author of the Boston circle. He is of the Irish type of beauty, with fine red and white complexion, black curling hair, large light blue eyes, with black lashes and eyebrows, and a drooping brown mustache. Mr. Beecher everybody knows. He is a trifle stouter than he was, his face is a little redder and his hair somewhat whiter, otherwise he is the same Henry Ward Beecher that we have known from our childhood. Mark Twain is the same long and lank Mark Twain that he always was, too; but he is beginning to show the effects of time and hard oaking, for his shock of hair is very gray, and so is his enormous mustache; his eyes are gray, too, but are as clear and sharp in their expression as they were twenty years ago.

George Parsons Lathrop has a rather foreign appearance his hair is black and curls close to his head, and he has a short curling beard and mustache, and, being very nearsighted, wears eye-glasses; he has grown stout of late, though he is still rather picturesque looking. Dr. Edward Eggleston strikes one at first as being all hair; he has an enormous crop on his head, which is very thick and quite long, and an immense unkempt beard and mustache, and deep set eyes overhung with heavy eyebrows.

These were the authors who took part in the readings but there were many more grouped on the platform around them, the most conspicuous among them being Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the Pittsburg iron manufacturer and millionaire, whose two books of travel entitle him to a place among the authors. Mr. Carnegie occupied a large armchair in which he threw himself back at full length and laughed like a boy out of school at everything funny that was said. Next to him sat Mr. Roswell Smith, the publisher of The Century, who though not an author, is very much interested in the copy-right bill.

Railroad Safety.

[Frank Leslie's.]

According to The Paris Gaulois an apparatus has just been invented which is simply astounding, for with it the traveler need no longer fear any accidents. Safety will be assured on railroads. This apparatus permits the employe charged with the duty to see into a mirror the entire section of the road he is to control, with all the trains in motion, and he knows at every instant just exactly where each train is. When one of them approaches another at a distance which is dangerous he can immediately signal the menaced train.

The apparatus consists of a sheet of opaque glass, on which the rails are indicated by horizontal lines and the stations by vertical ones, numbered. Little arrows, representing the trains, move along the horizontal lines. They are put in motion by aid of electricity, developed by the contact of metallic brushes attached to the locomotives with zinc bands placed along the rails. The train thus continually traces its trajectory on the glass indicator. The apparatus was exhibited some days ago in Germany to a commission of Berlin scientists.

Peppering the Sparrows.

[Chicago Times.]

A gentleman in Germantown, Pa., who was greatly annoyed by a colony of sparrows that had taken up their quarters in a mass of ivy covering one side of his house, got rid of them by a novel expedient. One day he purchased half a pound of red pepper, and going up to the third story, opened the windows and sifted the pepper down through the ivy. The alarm of the sparrows was evinced by the haste with which they left their hiding places. Every bird took its departure, and his premises are now clear of them.

County Official Paper.

Spain appears to be on the eve of a revolution. Meetings of influential men are being held who want to sweep away the sham monarchy and establish a republic. In Portugal crowds throng the streets of the cities and cheer for a republic. The Emperor of Austria is so discouraged with the condition of his empire that he is reported to be thinking strongly of following the example of Diocles an and Charles V. by abdicating. The silly American girls who want to marry Princes and other titled blackguards must hurry up before the whole beggarly trumpery is swept away.

A few more such transactions as the sale of a seat in the United States Senate to Mr. Brice is reasonably certain to bring about a change in the method of electing Senators. This case is so flagrant that men of blameless character, like Mr. Thurman, will not affiliate with those who make merchandise of the high dignity that of right belongs to a seat in the Senate. And when men like him unite regardless of party in opposition to such infamies an end of the traffic is sure to come.

When the resumption of specie payments was urged after the close of the Rebellion Horace Greely was laughed at for saying, "the way to resume is to resume." Yet the event proved that he was right. When it was decreed that specie payments would be resumed after a certain date the thing was done and there was neither trouble nor difficulty about it. It will be just the same with silver coinage. If unlimited silver coinage should be provided for by the Congress now in session it would be effected just as easily as the redemption of specie payments was effected.

Doctor Johnson said that being at sea was being in prison with a chance of being drowned. We are better situated here in Owens Valley; we are almost as much in prison as people at sea, but then we are in no risk of being drowned. Railroads blockaded for days together and no mails; telegraph wires down and no means of getting news from the outside world. We are so completely isolated that if the Valley should sink into the earth we would hardly be missed.

When such a man as Allen G. Thurman declares the election of Brice to the United States Senate as a disgrace to the Democratic party it is amusing to watch the squirming and wriggling of the party papers in their attempts to defend such a sell-out. This is the worst case yet of selling a seat in the United Senate. Payne's case was bad enough but the Democrats of Ohio have sunk to much lower depths since then

The Anarchists are at last engaged in a good work. Within about ten days nineteen of them committed suicide at New York and Brooklyn. But after all, these men were evidently earnest in the belief that the poor are treated with gross injustice and that there is no hope for improvement in this world. Mistaken, and even mad as such men are, it is hard to think of them without pity.

Several measures are now being discussed in Congress looking to some change in our laws on immigration. This should have been done long ago; the United States should not be a dumping place for the garbage of the world.

Carried the Proofs with Them.

Two ex-Confederates who applied for allowance under the maimed soldier act showed strong proof that they were badly hurt during the war. About 2 o'clock Mr. Lucius Maxwell walked in, and taking from his pocket an old Confederate passport slowly unwound it and laid before Col. Tip Harrison six pieces of his skull. Mr. Maxwell was a member of the Forty-second Georgia regiment, and received a terrible wound in the head in one of the battles around Atlanta in July, 1864. About 4 o'clock Mr. Josephus Riden came in and took from his pocketbook a piece of his own skull which he has preserved all these years. Mr. Riden was a member of the Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment, and was shot in the top of his head at the battle of Jonesboro. To this day these unfortunate veterans still suffer from the effects of their dangerous wounds, and have never been able to do steady work since they were received. It is hardly necessary to add that the applications of both were promptly allowed.—Atlanta Constitution.

MEN WHO HATE WOMEN.

A PHYSICIAN TELLS HIS EXPERIENCE WITH MISOGYNISTS.

A Mad Musician's Flight from His Family—Frightened by the Sight of a Woman—Prejudiced by Being Annoyed. Strange Cases of Aversion.

"Women haters? Plenty of them!"

A Journal reporter had met a well known physician in an uptown cafe and interrupted a conversation that the doctor was holding with a friend over a cigar and a bottle of claret. He spoke easily and with confidence that he knew his subject.

To hate a woman, especially one of the dainty, loving kind, upon whose glances men hang enthralled, or for whose kindly glances men would sacrifice their souls, seemed incredible. Perish the thought! And yet the visitor's mind brought into remembrance cases in which men had sworn they hated women, only to be captured and put in bondage by a pair of bright eyes.

The physician struck a fresh match and watched the smoke from his cigar curl lazily upward as he related a few strange incidents that had come under his observation professionally.

THE STORY TOLD BY HOLMES.

"One case that I recall," said the doctor, "was that of a German, a member of all the musical societies, who late in life acquired and betrayed an intense hatred of all women. He had been happily married, and no one suspected him of this new feeling that began to creep over him and destroy the love he had felt for his wife and the respect for his mother.

"He struggled against it and fought it, but it was no use, and the disease, if such it may be called, began to show itself to his family and friends, and an instant estrangement from his wife was the result. He ran away from his home and was finally returned hopelessly insane.

"Now," concluded the doctor, "there was a man who was a woman hater, only he did not know it because he was insane. The physicians had diagnosed his case aright."

The conversation turned then on a case that had been mentioned by Oliver Wendell Holmes in his book. A very young boy had been left in charge of a nurse, and she had suddenly gone insane. In her maniacal frenzy she tried to strangle her innocent charge, and only desisted when she thought she had succeeded in her object. Then she killed herself with a razor, which left her a most shocking sight. The boy revived, and the first thing his eyes fell upon was the corpse.

From that day throughout his childhood and up to the day of his death the sight of a woman was enough to throw him into convulsions. His nurses were men, and his family decided it best to seclude him. No woman ever entered his apartments, but all the work of taking care of him devolved upon men. He died in those rooms.

"Yes, that is very strange," said the physician, meditatively. "But I think I know of one nearly as remarkable," and he went on to relate the following:

"In the spring of '81 I was called in by a prominent banker to attend to his son, who had suddenly become afflicted with a strange state of mind, which proved to be a hatred of women. This his family could not understand, as he had always been a leader in social events and fond of ladies' society.

"I found the young fellow's constitution very much run down, and made him admit that he was a victim of the opium habit. He also confessed to me an adventure that had happened to him, but which I will not repeat, as it is too long, in which he had been scared nearly out of his wits by a woman.

"It was easy enough for me to see that unless the impression caught and retained by his mind in its enfeebled state could be removed, he would remain a woman hater all his life."

"Was it ever removed, doctor," asked one of the listeners.

"Never," was the answer, and the party relapsed into silence for a moment.

THEY ANNOYED HIM.

A diversion was caused by the waiter's removal of an empty bottle and the substitution of a fresh one, and the conversation was resumed.

"Tell us another, doctor," insinuated the newspaper man.

"I could tell you several more, but would have to do so briefly, as a patient is waiting for me," he responded. "I recollect a gentleman who stood very high in all affairs connected with education in New York. He, too, was a woman hater. As his opinion on school affairs was considered valuable, many teachers, especially ladies, used to run to him for advice, but as he was deeply engaged in study, their calls were a source of annoyance to him and irritated him into the state of mind that I have mentioned.

"He was a bachelor, but he finally discharged all women servants, substituting men. And orders were given that no woman was to be allowed to set foot within his doors. He has often told me that women had prevented his reaching the highest rounds of science and that he could never regain the time lost.

"I knew another case where a man intrusted his entire fortune to a woman and she made away with it and made a woman hater out of him. He would never address one.

"But," concluded the doctor, impressively, "I think that designing mothers are responsible for many of the woman haters, as they frequently prevent their daughters from marrying the men of their choice, and when a girl deserts the man she loves and marries another, it is very apt to do mental injury to the first."—New York Journal.

Brought Them Out in Sections.

One of our county physicians, who lives at Tazewell, was called to see a very tall gentleman who lives in the neighborhood of Brantly, and who was sick with the measles. On account of the exceeding height of the man the doctor advised him to paint a ring around his body with iodine and he would proceed to bring the measles out on him one end at a time, as it would be impossible to accomplish the whole job at once. Our informant states that the ring was drawn and the measles brought out in sections.—Buena Vista (Ga.) Patriot.

COURT NOTES.

Superior Court of Inyo County California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

TUESDAY, January 21st.

Estate and guardianship of R. Fred Brooks, an insane person—Mrs. Brooks appointed guardian.

Vernon Smith of Big Pine was in town Monday.

Ben. Lasky of Lone Pine was in town last Monday.

Pete Meyers was up from Keeler in the first part of the week.

Mr. Hampton says there is more freight at Mojave for Owens Valley than the present teams can haul.

Attorney Forbes was down from Bishop at the beginning of the week on business in the Superior Court.

Great loss of sheep is reported in Eastern Nevada. The bands are snowed under and the sheep die of cold and hunger.

Mr. S. A. Densmore has been very ill for several weeks past. He is so far recovered as be out doors, but is yet very weak.

Walker Blaine, son of the Secretary of State, died at Washington last week of pneumonia brought on by la grippe.

Mr. T. C. Boland has moved a large warehouse that formerly stood about two miles below Keeler and rebuilt it close to the railroad station at Keeler.

To preach goodness, mercy, truth, not for the bribe of heaven or from the fear of hell, but in the name of God the Father, is to preach Christ.—Robertson.

A late quotation for silver was 97½. This is the highest quotation in several years. The waking up of the friends of silver is having some effect.

Ten inches of snow fell at Reno last Tuesday night. The total snowfall at that place up till Saturday was 51.3 inches, or four feet and three and three-tenths inches.

The Independence Hotel won't be behind in preparation for the Spring business. Levy has an artist at work decorating the rooms and also making other improvements.

The Crocker Brothers of Big Pine intend driving three hundred head of beef cattle to Bakersfield. The drive will be started as soon as the weather moderates a little.

O. A. Hampton got to Independence last night with his freight team from Mojave. His cargo is general merchandise and kerosene, all for Bishop. He reports the road in good condition.

Mr. J. C. Crocker, of Big Pine, passed through town yesterday on his way to Bakersfield. He expects to be gone about three weeks. R. J. Whittaker accompanied him. Dick expects to be gone till next fall.

One of the most dangerous cases of la grippe in this neighborhood was Mr. Dryer at Black Rock. The patient is advanced in years and was in feeble health before being seized with the epidemic. Dr. Woodin managed to pull him through and he is now out of danger.

The Reno Gazette says the loss in cattle and sheep in Nevada will be something fearful and it will take two or three years to recover. But there is the satisfaction of knowing there will be a glorious harvest, plenty of water, good health and happiness.

Owens Valley will never prosper rapidly till there shall be a southern outlet by rail. There has been a blockade of business and travel for some weeks by the heavy snow storms north of us, while the route south of us is never interrupted from any cause.

The unusually cold weather has caused a good deal of trouble with water pipe in town. When the water pipes were laid no such weather was expected and they were not covered deep enough; the cold snap has frozen them up till they burst.

Parties knowing themselves to be indebted to me for work done are respectfully requested to call and settle immediately as I intend leaving town for a time. On my departure February 1st all my accounts will be placed in the hand of an attorney for collection. A. J. DAVIS.

The pass over the Inyo mountains from Alvord to Saline Valley was opened at the beginning of the week. Two big teams loaded with borax from Conn & Trudo's works got in on Monday. There is now a large stock of borax at the works ready for shipment and the teams will be kept busy.

H. H. Spears got in to-day from Mojave with his big team. He is loaded with general merchandise for Bishop. He arrived at Mojave just at the time when the railroads were washed out with the big rain and was detained there eleven days waiting for his load.

Mrs. Elihu Smith, mother-in-law of W. S. Morton, died at the home of the latter at Blockrock on Thursday morning. The remains will be interred at the Odd Fellows cemetery, Independence, to-morrow. Her husband died at Blackrock three years ago at the age of eighty-four. Mrs. Smith had lived in Owens Valley about nineteen years.

All East bound trains on the C. P. have been held at Blue Canyon, on the west side of the mountains. West bound trains have been held at Truckee and Reno. Several trains that had passed Reno going west were forced to return to that place. The Gazette says that the snow plows were blockaded and there was no telling when the road over the summit would be open.

Ed. Ober and Marsh. Naylor came down from Big Pine last Monday and have been quail hunting in this vicinity with good success. Yesterday they brought in an even hundred birds. They are very liberal in sharing with their friends. Quail are plentiful about Independence and are plump and fat. The boys are not pot hunters, all of their birds being killed on the wing.

Mineral Wealth.

Mr. G. A. Smith, of Los Angeles, who was at Independence recently gave the following report to the Los Angeles Tribune of his trip through the mining regions of Inyo county and along the line of the railroad now being built from Salt Lake to Los Angeles.

"I have traveled during the last three weeks about 2,500 miles, going by rail and coming in from the north into a mining region of which I have heard a great deal, but previously have known but very little from actual observation. I have gained sufficient information during the trip to satisfy myself that the public generally, and, in fact very few mining men, have no idea of the enormous mineral wealth that will at once be made directly tributary to Los Angeles on the completion of this road. Leaving out the question of the almost inexhaustible beds of bituminous coal which can be laid down here for $5 per ton, the immense deposits of high grade iron ore which will be brought here for reduction, the great forests of timber which will be made more directly tributary to this section (all of which has been so thoroughly discussed by the press), the amount of wealth contained in the lead and silver mines, gold, antimony, copper and other minerals that will at once be made accessible, is simply fabulous. Notwithstanding the present inaccessibility of that country on account of the absence of railway facilities, the country has been pretty thoroughly looked over by the prospector, and large numbers of valuable discoveries made and mines located which, although containing large bodies of rich ore, at present are valueless and almost entirely neglected, except in a few instances where ore is found so rich that it pays the chlorider to pack on animals to the nearest railway and then ship long distances to market.

"As an instance of what can be done, I have during this trip bonded a group of five antimony mines containing what seems to be an almost inexhaustible quantity of the highest grade of free antimony ore known to exist in this or any other country. According to tests which I have had made the ore contains over 60 per cent antimony and will work to 50 per cent. At the present market price of antimony this ore is worth $250 per ton. Upon the completion of the Union Pacific this ore could be mined and shipped to Los Angeles for $15 per ton, leaving the enormous profit of $235 per ton to the owner. These mines were bonded in the interest of Dr. R. H. Chase of Boston, Mass., a gentleman of large means and long and varied mining experience in different parts of the world. The Doctor has intimated that he will establish large reduction works here to work the ore as soon as the desired railway facilities are an assured fact."

School Apportionment.

The County School Superintendent has made the following apportionment:

Bishop	$410 00
Big Pine	180 00
Darwin	144 00
Fish Springs	180 00
Irving	180 00
Independence	180 00
Lone Pine	262 92
Milton	180 00
Round Valley	180 00
Station	180 00
Union	180 00
Warm Springs	180 00
	$2,436 92

A charge of $1.50 is made to each district for a library stamp. Bishop and Lone Pine receive an additional amount for extra census children.

Fire-Proof Building.

Mr. J. H. Bulpitt, a merchant at Bishop, is said to be preparing to build a fine fire-proof store there. The front is be of iron and a firm at St. Louis offer to deliver the castings at Bishop cheaper than they could be got from San Francisco. Near the town of Bishop is an abundance of fire-proof stone that can be hewn out with axes like wood and makes the finest building stone. It is as white as marble and it is said that it can be got cheaper than lumber. The building is designed to be two stories high and will be a handsome structure. No doubt other buildings of the same kind will follow. With such an abundance of fine building stone close at hand Bishop could be made a very handsome town.

Delayed Mails.

Last Monday evening a train came in from the north on the C. & C. road. That was the first that had come south since Wednesday of the preceding week. Between Dayton and Mound House the road was blockaded with snow and north bound trains were laid over at that place. On the V. & T. road snow was from two to ten feet deep and no trains could pass over that road. On the C. P. the snow was from five to forty feet deep and the road was completely blockaded. On the road to Grass Valley one train was sixty-four hours going seventeen miles. The telegraph wires were torn down by the snow and no communication could be had west of the Sierras.

Death of Albert Harris.

William Albert Harris died at Dayton, Nevada, on Wednesday of last week. He was aged thirty-one years and two months. Albert Harris was well known at Independence, having been here several times as short hand reporter in the Superior Court. He was a young man of much more than average ability; he had read much of the best literature, was very interesting in conversation, and had his life been prolonged till years and experience had tamed the impulsiveness of youth he would surely have risen to distinction. He was not without faults, but those lay on the surface and closer acquaintance showed that his heart was good and his disposition manly.

Great Loss of Cattle.

Up on the Carson River the ranchers have recently killed about one hundred wildcats. The varmints were tracked in the snow. A correspondent writing to the Gazette says: "Scores of cattle die daily from starvation and exhaustion. Leading stockmen estimate that there is already a loss of one-half the range cattle, and a few owners of herds endeavor to console themselves with the belief that the remnant will be worth twice or treble as much another year. Cattle men seem to prefer allowing their stock to die rather than to purchase feed for them or give them to other stock owners who would winter them for their possession.

Cold Weather.

Mono county has some climate of her own, as the following from the Bridgeport Chronicle Union will show: "We have had a specimen of climate this week that would keep us out of the Citrus Belt. On Monday morning the spirits registered 40° below zero; Tuesday, 44°; Wednesday, 40° Wednesday afternoon and evening it moderated some and on Thursday morning it was 20° below zero, but it continued to moderate and yesterday morning it was 18° above zero, a very agreeable change."

Started Too Quick.

Last Wednesday evening P. G. Grant left town for the Eight-mile House. He left in too much of a hurry. When he got into the wagon the team at once started on a wild run-a-way. They went flying out of town northward but had not gone far when the outfit was demolished as completely as the Deacon's "wonderful one-hoss shay," that went to pieces all at once. "All at once and nothing first, just as bubbles do when the burst." Grant came out all right but the wagon might be called Baalbec, like Mark Twain's horse, because it is an utter ruin.

A Treat In Store.

For some time past a number of the young people of Independence have been preparing to give a performance of the opera "Mikado." The utmost pains has been taken by each one to master the role assigned them. No doubt the performance will be highly diverting and enjoyable. The performers steadily continue rehearsals and study and will continue until the time of performance. The evening of Friday, February 28, is the date set for the entertainment. See the advertisement.

Train Dispatches.

The following telegrams were sent to-day by the train dispatcher at Hawthorne:

TO ALL AGENTS—Trains No. 3 of to-day, January 24 h, and No. 4 of to-morrow, January 25th, are abandoned.

C. P. MENGEL.

TO ALL AGENTS—Train No. 3 of to-day has been abandoned on account of the failure of the C. P. to get the mail through. The C. P. Folks think they will get through to-morrow, in which event we will run a special train with mail on Sunday.

C. P. MENGEL.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m., at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening; Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Mr. John Baxter has moved into his new house. This is by far the finest farm residence at Independence and is second to none in the county. The building is two stories high; on the ground floor are a parlor and sitting room, two bed rooms, kitchen and dining room, bath room and pantries. The upper story is divided into several bed rooms and one good sized hall as a play room for children. The house stands in a fine orchard just outside the town limits and the whole makes a home that might satisfy any reasonable person.

Johnson had a good thing in clock mending, but, like Othello, his occupation's gone. Mr. F. E. Bosworth, a professional, came to town a few days ago and that let William out. Mr. Bosworth has already done several nice jobs and is therefore a workman of approved skill. He is also connected with a fine photograph gallery now at Bishop. He will be at the Norman House for some days yet. See his advertisement.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

CHAPTER I.

HAROLD QUARITCH MEDITATES.

There are some things and faces which, when felt or seen for the first time, project themselves upon the minds like a sun image on a sensitive plate and there remain unalterably fixed. To take the case of a face—we may never see it again, or it may become the companion of our life, but there the picture is just as we first knew it, the same smile, the same look, unaltering and unalterable, reminding us in the midst of change of the absolutely indestructible nature of every experience, act and aspect of our life. For that which has been is, since the past knows no change and no corruption, but lives eternally in its frozen and completed self.

These are somewhat large words to be born of a small matter, but they rose up spontaneously in the mind of a soldierly looking man who was leaning, on the particular evening when this history opens, over a gate in an eastern country lane, staring vacantly at a ripe field of corn.

He was a peculiar and rather battered looking individual, apparently over 40 years of age, and yet bearing upon him that unmistakable stamp of dignity and self respect which, if it does not exclusively belong to, is yet one of the distinguishing attributes of the English gentleman. In face he was ugly, no other word can express it. He e were not the long mustaches, the almond eyes, the aristocratic air of the colonel of fiction—for our dreamer was a colonel. These were—alas! that the truth should be so plain—represented by somewhat scrubby, sandy colored whiskers, small but kindly blue eyes, a low, broad forehead, with a deep line running across it from side to side, something like that to be seen upon the bust of Julius Cæsar, and a long, thin nose. One good feature, however, he did possess, a mouth of such sweetness and beauty that, set as it was above a very square and manly looking chin, it had the air of being ludicrously out of place. "Umph," said his old aunt, Mrs. Massey (who had just died and left him what she had), on the occasion of her first introduction to him five-and-thirty years before, "umph! Nature meant to make a pretty girl of you, and changed her mind after she had finished the mouth. Well, never mind, better be a plain man than a pretty woman. There, go along, boy, I like your ugly face."

Nor was the old lady peculiar in this respect, for plain as the countenance of Col. Harold Quaritch undoubtedly was, people found something very takin; about it when once they got used to its rugged air and stern, regulated expression. What that something was it would be hard to define, but perhaps the nearest approach to the truth would be to describe it as a light of purity which, notwithstanding the popular idea to the contrary, is to be found quite as often upon the faces of men as upon those of women. Any person of discernment in looking at Col. Quaritch must have felt that he was in the presence of a good man, not a prig or milksop, but a man who had attained to virtue by thought and struggle that had left their mark upon his face, a man whom it would not be well to tamper with, and one to be respected by all, and feared of evil doers. Men felt this, and he was popular among those who knew him in his service, though not in any hail-fellow well-met kind of way. But among women he was not popular. As a rule, they both feared and disliked him. His presence jarred upon the frivolity of the lighter members of their sex, who dimly realized that his nature was antagonistic, and the more solid ones could not understand him. Perhaps this was the reason why Col. Quaritch had never married, had never even had a love affair since he was five-and twenty.

And yet it was of a woman's face that he was thinking as he leaned over the gate and looked at the field of yellowing corn, undulating like a golden sea beneath the pressure of the wind.

Col. Quaritch had twice in his life been at Honham before the present time, when he had come to abide there for good and all, once ten and once four years ago. His old aunt, Mrs. Massey, had a place in the village—a very small place—called Honham cottage, or Molehill, and he had on these two occasions been down to stay with her. Now Mrs. Massey was dead and buried, and had left him the property, and he had given up his profession, in which he had no further prospects, and come to live at Honham. This was his first evening in the place, for he had arrived by the last train on the previous night. All day he had been busy trying to get the house a little straight, and now, thoroughly tired of the task, he was refreshing himself by leaning over a gate. It is, though a great many people will not believe it, one of the most delightful refreshments in the world.

And then it was, as he leaned over the gate, that the image of a woman's face rose before his mind as it had been continually rising for the last five years. It was five years since he had seen it, and those five years he had spent in India and Egypt. It seemed but the other day that he had been leaning over this very gate, and had turned to see a young girl dressed in black, with a spray of honeysuckle stuck in her girdle, and a stick in her hand, walking leisurely down the lane. There was something about the girl's air that had struck him while she was yet a long way off—a dignity and a grace, and a set of the shoulders, and then as she came nearer he saw the soft dark eyes and the waving brown hair that contrasted so strangely and effectively with the pale and striking face. It was not a beautiful face, for the mouth was too large, and the nose was not as straight as it might have been, but there was a power about the broad brow, and a force and solid nobility stamped upon the features which had impressed him strangely. Just as she arrived opposite to where he was standing a gust of wind, for there was a stiff breeze, had blown the lady's hat off, taking it right over the hedge, and he, as in duty bound, had scrambled into the field and fetched it for her, and she had thanked him with a quick smile and a lighting up of the brown eyes, and then passed on with a bow.

Yes, with a little bow she had passed on, and he had watched her departing down the long level drift, till she melted into the stormy sunset light, and was gone. When he returned to the cottage he had described her to his old aunt, and asked who she might be, to learn that her name was Ida de la Molle, which sounded like a name out of a novel, the only daughter of the old squire who lived at Honham castle. And then next day he had left for India, and saw Miss de la Molle no more.

And now he wondered what had become of her. Probably she was married, so striking a person would be almost sure to attract the notice of men. And after all, what could it matter to him? He was not a marrying man, and women as a class had little attraction for him, indeed he disliked them. It has been said that he had never married, and never even had a love affair since he was five-and twenty, and this was true enough. But though he was not married, he, once before he was five and twenty, had very nearly taken that step. It was twenty years ago, and nobody quite knew the history, for in twenty years many things are fortunately forgotten. But there was a history, and a scandal, and the marriage was broken off almost on the very day before it was to have taken place. And after that it leaked out in the neighborhood—it was in Essex—that the young lady, who by the way was a large heiress, had gone off her head, presumably with grief, and been confined in an asylum where she was believed still to remain.

Perhaps it was the thought of this one woman's face, the woman he had once seen walking down the drift, her figure limned out against the stormy sky, that led him to think of the other face, the face hidden in the mad house. At any rate, with a sigh, or rather a groan, he swung himself round from the gate, and began walking homeward at a brisk pace.

Shaking himself clear of his sad thoughts, Harold Quaritch turned round at his own front door to contemplate the scene. The long, single storied house stood, as has been said, at the top of the rising land, and to the south and west and east commanded as beautiful a view as is to be seen in that country. There, a mile or so away to the south, situated in the midst of grassy grazing grounds, flanked on either side by still perfect towers, frowned the massive gateway of the old Norman castle. Then, to the west, almost at the foot of the Molehill the ground broke away in a deep bank clothed with timber, which led the eye down by slow descents into the beautiful valley of the Ell. Here the silver river wound its gentle way through lush and poplar bordered marshes, where the cattle stand knee deep in flowers, past quaint wooden mill houses, through Boisingham Old Common, windy looking even now, and brightened here and there with a clump of golden gorse, till it was lost in the picturesque cluster of red tiled roofs that marked the ancient town. Look which way he would, the view was lovely, and equal to any to be found in the eastern counties, where the scenery is fine enough in its own way, whatever people, whose imaginations are so weak that they require a mountain and a torrent to excite them into activity, may choose to say to the contrary.

Behind the house to the north there was no view, and for a good reason, for here, in the very middle of the back garden, rose a mound of large size and curious shape, which completely shut the landscape out. What this mound, which may perhaps have covered half an acre of ground, was nobody had any idea. Some learned folk said that it was a Saxon tumulus, a presumption to which its ancient name, "Dead Man's Mount," seemed to give color. Other folk, however, yet more learned, declared that it was an ancient British dwelling, and pointed triumphantly to a hollow at the top, wherein the ancient Britishers were supposed to have moved, lived and had their being, which must, urged the opposing party, have been a very damp one. Thereon, the late Mrs. Massey, who was a British dweller, proceeded to show with much triumph how they had lived in the hole by building a huge mushroom shaped roof over it, and thereby turning it into a summer house, which, owing to the unexpected difficulties in the construction of the roof, cost a great deal of money. But as the roof was slated, and as it was found necessary to pave the hole with tiles and cut surface drains in it, the result did not clearly prove its use as a dwelling place before the Roman conquest. Nor did it make a very good summer house. Indeed, it now served as a store place for the gardeners' tools and for rubbish generally.

CHAPTER II.

THE COLONEL MEETS THE SQUIRE.

Suddenly, as Col. Quaritch was contemplating these various views and reflecting that on the whole he had done well to come and live at Honham cottage, he was startled by a loud voice saluting him from about twenty yards distance with such a peculiar vigor that he fairly jumped.

"Col. Quaritch, I believe," said, or rather shouted, the voice from somewhere down the drive.

"Yes," answered the colonel mildly, "here I am."

"Ah, I thought it was you. Always tell a military man, you know. Excuse me, but I am resting for a minute, this last pull is an uncommonly stiff one. I always used to tell my dear old friend, Mrs. Massey, that she ought to have the hill cut away a bit just here. Well, here goes for it," and after a few heavy steps the visitor emerged from the shadow of the trees into the sunset light which was playing on the terrace before the house.

Col. Quaritch glanced up curiously to see who the owner of the great voice might be, and his eyes lighted upon as fine a specimen of humanity as he had seen for a long while. The man was old, as his white hair showed, 70 perhaps, but that was the only sign of decay about him. He was a splendid man, broad and thick and strong, with a keen, quick eye, and a face sharply chiseled and clean shaved, of the stamp which in novels is generally known as aristocratic, a face that, in fact, showed both birth and breeding. Indeed, as clothed in loose tweed garments and a gigantic pair of top boots, his visitor stood there, leaning on his long stick and resting himself after breasting the hill, Harold Quaritch thought to himself that he had never seen a more perfect specimen of the typical English country gentleman—as the English country gentlemen used to be.

The colonel meets the squire.

"How do you do, sir, how do you do? My name is De la Molle. My man George, who knows everybody's business except his own, told me that you had arrived here, so I thought that I would walk round, and do myself the honor of making your acquaintance."

"That is very kind of you," said the colonel.

"Not at all. If you only knew how uncommonly dull it is down here you would not say that. The place isn't what it used to be when I was a boy. There are plenty of rich people about, but they are not the same stamp of people. It isn't what it used to be in more ways than one," and the old squire gave something like a sigh, and thoughtfully removed his white hat, out of which a dinner napkin and two pocket handkerchiefs fell to the ground, in a fashion that reminded Col. Quaritch of the climax of a conjuring trick.

"You have dropped some—some linen," he said, stooping down to pick the mysterious articles up.

"Oh, yes, thank you," answered his visitor, "I find the sun a little hot at this time of the year. There is nothing like a few handkerchiefs or a towel to keep it off," and he rolled the mass of napery into a ball, and cramming it back into the crown, replaced the hat on his head in such a fashion that about eight inches of white napkin hung down behind. "You must have felt it in Egypt," he went on—"the sun, I mean. It's a bad climate, that Egypt, as I have good reason to know," and he pointed again to his white hat, which, as Harold Quaritch now observed for the first time, was encircled by a broad black band.

"Ah, I see," said he, "I suppose that you have had a loss."

"Yes, sir, a very heavy loss."

Now Col. Quaritch had never heard that Mr de la Molle had more than one child, Ida de la Molle, the young lady whose face had remained so strongly fixed in his memory although he had scarcely spoken to her on that one occasion five long years ago. Could it be possible that she had died in Egypt? The idea sent a tremor of fear through him though of course there was no real reason why it should. Deaths are so common.

"Not—not Miss de la Molle?" he said, nervously, adding, "I had the pleasure of seeing her once, a good many years ago, when I was stopping here for a few days with my aunt."

"Oh, no, not Ida, she is alive and well thank God. Her brother James. He went all through that wretched war, which we owe to Mr Gladstone, as I say, though I don't know what your politics are, and then caught a fever, or, as I think, got touched by the sun, and died on his way home. Poor boy! He was a fine fellow, Col. Quaritch and my only son, but very reckless. Only a month or so before he died I wrote to him to be careful always to put a towel in his helmet, and he answered, in that flippant sort of way that he had, that he was not going to turn himself in a dirty clothes bag, and that he rather liked the heat than otherwise. Well, he's gone, poor fellow, in the service of his country, like many of his ancestors before him, and there's an end of him."

And again the old man sighed, heavily this time.

"And now, Col. Quaritch," he went on, shaking off his oppression with a curious rapidity that was characteristic of him, "what do you say to coming up to the castle for your dinner? You must be in a mess here, and I expect that old Mrs. Jobson, whom my man George tells me you have got to look after you, will be glad enough to be rid of you for to-night. What do you say? Take the place as you find it, you know. I know that there is a leg of mutton for dinner if there is nothing else, because, instead of minding his own business, I saw George going off to Boisingham to fetch it this morning. At least, that is what he said that he was going for, just an excuse to gossip and idle, I fancy."

"Well, really" said the colonel, "you are very kind, but I don't think that my dress clothes are unpacked yet."

"Dress clothes! Oh, never mind your dress clothes. Ida will excuse you, I dare say. Besides, you have no time to dress. By Jove it's nearly 7 o'clock, we must be off if you are coming."

The colonel hesitated. He had intended to dine at home, and being a methodical minded man did not like altering his plans. Also he was, like most old military men, very punctilious about his dress and personal appearance, and objected to going out to dinner in a shooting coat. But all this notwithstanding a feeling that he did not quite understand, and that it would have puzzled even an American novelist to analyze—something between restlessness and curiosity, with a dash of magnetic attraction thrown in—got the better of his scrupples, and he went.

"Well, thank you," he said, "if you are sure that Miss de la Molle will not mind, I will come. Just allow me to tell Mrs. Jobson."

"That's right," hallooed the squire after him. "I'll meet you at the back of the house. We had better go through the fields."

The colonel, having informed his housekeeper that he should not want any dinner, and hastily brushed his not too luxuriant locks, rejoined Mr. de la Molle.

They strolled along, stopping now and again to admire some particular oak or view, chatting all the while in a discursive manner, which, though it was somewhat aimless, was by no means without its charm. The squire was a capital companion for a silent man like Harold Quaritch, who liked to hear other people talk.

In this way they got down the slope, and passing through a couple of wheat fields came to a succession of broad meadows, somewhat sparsely timbered, through which the footpath ran right up to the grim gateway of the ancient castle, which now loomed before them, outlined in red lines of fire against the ruddy background of the sunset sky.

In another three minutes they had crossed a narrow byroad and were passing up the ancient drive that led to the castle gates.

Right before them was the gateway of the castle, flanked by two great towers, and that, with the exception of some ruins, was, as a matter of fact, all that remained of the ancient building, which had been effectually demolished in the time of Cromwell. The space within, where the keep had once stood, was now laid out as a flower garden, while the house, which was of an unpretentious nature, had built in the Jacobean style, occupied the south side of the square, and was placed with the back to the moat.

"You see I have practically rebuilt those two towers," said the squire, pausing underneath the Norman archway. "If I had not done so," he added, apologetically, "they would have been in ruins by now, but it cost a pretty penny, I can tell you. Nobody knows what stuff that old flint masonry is to deal with, till he tries it. Well, it will stand now for many a long day. And here we are"—and he pushed open a porch door and then passed through a passage into a kind of oak paneled vestibule, which was hung with tapestry originally taken, no doubt, from the old castle, and decorated with coats of armor, spear heads and ancient swords.

And here it was that Harold Quaritch once more beheld the face that had haunted his memory for so many months.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

A recent rival of George Peabody has appeared in Sir Edward Guinness, the great brewer, who has given £250,000 to the poor of London and Dublin, to be used in the erection of artisans' dwellings—£200,000 for London and £50,000 for Dublin. The sum has been turned over to trustees, of whom Lord Rowton is the chief.

The Pall Mall Gazette records a freak in the way of handwriting. A little girl of 4 years writes with her left hand, and writes her words backward, as they are reflected in a mirror from ordinary writing. Her friends have read them easily in aid of a looking-glass. The child was taught writing with a sister, but would do things in her own way, with the result that she writes fluently in this fantastic style.

According to recent information cannibalism is very prevalent in some places in West Africa, near to the British settlement, if not actually in the protectorate itself, and so serious and frequent has become the kidnapping of individuals who have gone out alone that in some parts persons dare not venture beyond their own town for fear of capture.

SATISFY YOURSELF.

The way people are questioning their grocers about the adulteration of baking powders has stirred up that part of the mercantile community to taking more care in their selection of manufactured articles. The consumers are rapidly awakening to the fact that nearly all the cheap brands and prize goods, as well as some high priced brands advertised as "Absolutely Pure," contain either Alum or Ammonia, and some of them both of these adulterants.

A simple test of the purity of baking powder, is to mix in a tin cup two heaping teaspoonfuls of the Powder with three teaspoonfuls of cold water, place it over the fire, stir ing constantly, allow it to boil thoroughly, or, until the gas escapes freely; then smell; if adulterated the odor of Ammonia will be plainly perceived. The presence of Ammonia in most cases indicates that alum is used, as nearly all the alum of commerce contains Ammonia. Pure Baking Powder will not give the faintest Ammoniacal odor. Baking powders composed principally of Starch, Alum and terra alba, boil into a thick dirty paste.—New York World.

A VALUABLE MEDICAL TREATISE.

The edition for 1890 of the sterling Medical Annual, known as Hostetter's Almanac, is now ready, and may be obtained, free of cost, of druggists and general country dealers in all parts of the United States, Mexico, and indeed in every civilized portion of the Western Hemisphere. This Almanac has been issued regularly at the commencement of every year for over one-fourth a century. It combines, with the soundest practical advice for the preservation and restoration of health, a large amount of interesting and amusing light reading, and the calendar, astronomical calculations, chronological items, &c., are prepared with great care, and will be found entirely accurate. The issue of Hostetter's Almanac for 1890 will probably be the largest edition of a medical work ever published in any country. The proprietors Messrs. Hostetter & Co., Pittsburg, Pa., on receipt of a two-cent stamp, will forward a copy by mail to any person who cannot procure one in his neighborhood.

Swedetown, near Ashtabula, Ohio, is two years old and has 1,800 people, nearly all Swedes.

EVERY SYMPTOM GONE.

Probably no disease inflicts so much continuous pain as Rheumatism. Over no single complaint has Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., won more cures than Rheumatism. By its use the agonized patient can once more use his limbs and feel from past years of pain.

Mr. Frank Stratt, a well-known merchant of New Hamburgh, N. Y., says: "I suffered tortures from Sciatic Rheumatism. My case was a very bad one, and none of the means taken gave me relief. I use Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., and am entirely rid of every symptom of my trouble. Only three bottles brought about this wonderful result. It has built me up and been of great benefit to me in other ways. I heartily recommend it to other sufferers."

DR. KENNEDY'S FAVORITE REMEDY, made at Rondout, N. Y. 81; 6 for $5.

HOPE FOR THE SICK.

One Remedy for One Disease.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a single bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of honest remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The specific for Catarrh cures that and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. To these is added a specific for Fever and Ague, one for female weakness—a general tonic and blood-maker that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility." These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease is sent free on application by HOSPITAL REMEDY COMPANY, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

There are five New Yorks, nine Philadelphias and twelve Bostons in the United States.

"Why need it be?" we say, and sigh
When loving mothers fade and die,
And leave the little ones whose feet
They hoped to guide in pathways sweet.

It need not be in many cases. All about us women are dying daily whose lives might have been saved. It comes to be a wide-spread opinion that when a woman is slowly fading away with the diseases which grow out of female weaknesses and irregularities that there is no help for her, she is doomed to death. But this is not the case. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is constantly restoring women afflicted with diseases of this class to health and happiness. It is the only medicine for their ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers of its giving satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be refunded.

THE RUNAWAYS.

The same year that Lady Jane Magnus presented her beautiful daughter Adela, Lord Glencore was the match of the season. Just of age, of an old family, with vast possessions and a heavy rent roll, swelled by a long minority, the instant the hawk like eye of Lady Jane fell on the young peer a thrill of joy assured her that there stood the husband Providence had provided for Adela.

"You think it is all right, mother, do you?" Adela ventured to say, growing a little uneasy when the end of the season drew near, and Lord Glencore had never addressed a single remark to her which could by any possibility be construed into love.

"Perfectly right, dear. The society papers have coupled your names together. An approaching marriage has more than once been hinted at, and, as a matter of course, now wherever people ask us he is asked."

"Well, but——"

"Dear child, you may leave it to me. Don't you think so?" And an expression of mild reproach was shot from the maternal eye. "Do you fancy that if I saw the slighest shadow of uncertainty I should accept Sir Jocelyn's invitation for Goodwood, knowing that Glencore won't be there?"

"Won't he? Why, where is he going?"

"Nowhere; I ascertained that, you may be sure. He is obliged to remain in town. There'll not be a soul left for him to speak to. Some business with his lawyer, he said—and said it in a very pointed way, too."

"Stammering and getting fiery red," said the would be fiance disdainfully.

Lady Jane shook her head. "Never mind the manner; it is the meaning we are concerned in. He joins us immediately after at Thorndean. There you will see that everything will be satisfactorily arranged. Lady Somerton has such a happy way of letting young people be thrown together, and from the first I have seemed to be very much guided by her."

Adela embraced her mother with graceful effusion.

"How clever you are!" she said admiringly; "you have managed beautifully, for I did want to enjoy Goodwood free. When I am a countess, mamma, it shall be very nice for you."

II.

Certainly Goodwood week had left London wonderfully empty. You did not meet a soul you knew.

Lord Glencore repeated this fact to himself most cheerily as he walked along Piccadilly with a heart and step as light as a bird's.

It seems an impossible circumstance that a stalwart young giant, standing over six feet in his stockings, his own master, able to do what he liked and go where he chose, should be in abject thralldom to a plain little middle aged woman who was bent on compelling him to marry her daughter. "And I feel as if I should be made to do it, too," poor Glencore had said of late, driven into his last corner by the congratulations of all Lady Jane's friends, to say nothing of these horrid paragraphs in those horrid papers, some of which had gone so far as to mention an early date being fixed "for the marriage of a lovely debutante of this season and a young earl recently of age, whose ancestors came over with the Conquerer."

If he could but pluck up courage to say he did not mean anything, never had meant anything, never meant to mean anything—that he was quite happy as he was—that he never intended to marry any one—what would he not give!

Full of a wild scheme which had lately come to him, that he would run off to some far distant country, he was mapping out the details as he walked along, so occupied that he forgot how far he had come, until within a sudden start he pulled himself up. He was passing the Albert Hall, close to that pleasant row of houses in one of which lived Lady Jane.

The knowledge that he could walk boldly by and fling a look of defiance at the papered windows and closed shutters, as he had done the day before, sent a thrill of satisfaction through the young man. He drew himself up and turned his head to — when, oh, agony! exactly as he was opposite to it the door opened and a voice called out "Glencore!"

"Freddy! Is it you?" Lord Glencore managed to say, seeing he was addressed by a weasel faced young gentleman between 16 and 17. "Why, how came you here? Is-s-s your mother—Lady Jane—with you?"

Freddy's eyes were apparently so educated that in order to give full expression to one he was forced to shut the other, and regarding Lord Glencore through his single optic he said, "You bet if she was, I shouldn't be here."

Glencore's heart seemed restored to its native position. "I'm very glad to see you," he said, closing his hand over the little fin Freddy had extended to him; "it's quite a surprise to me."

"Here, I say," said the astute Freddy significantly, "what's up? How is it you ain't down there with them?"

"Well, I couldn't—I have—that is—there is some business for me."

Freddy's eyelid went down like a cover of a box.

"Exactly; just so," he said, airily, putting his thumbs into his armholes. "My case is all over. I'm at my tutor's, you see, so please to remember that it isn't possible for you to have seen me."

Glencore laughed cheerily. "All right," he said; "you are quite safe with me—but what on earth are you up to?"

This question seemed prompted by the sight of a nondescript dog cart just led up to the door. "Are you all by yourself here?"

"There's Harris, my old nurse, and Jim, her husband—our butler he used to be—and Peggy. You know Peg, don't you?"

"Peg! No, I don't think I do."

"I say," exclaimed Freddy, "isn't it a beastly shame the way they always try to shun her? and she's just as good as anybody. Her father was my father's eldest son, only he married his tutor's daughter, and my lady set the governor on to cut up rough about it. So the poor chap got the kick out, and then he died, and so did his wife, and a jolly good thing for me, too, or I would have had to sing small. Only wait till I am master, though, and if they try it on with Peggy then, I'll let them know. She's older than I am, but all the same, I'm her uncle, and—I say you'll be her uncle, too, if you marry Adda, and you're going to, ain't you?"

Lord Glencore blushed furiously, and Freddy, taking silence for consent, added with a snort of supreme content, "It's a jolly good thing for her I ain't you. Catch me marrying Adda! Oh yes, rather!"

Not desirous of pursuing this topic further, Lord Glencore put a question.

"You're not going to drive that," he said, nodding toward the horse, a most vicious looking screw, "are you?"

"Why not? He's a real good one to go. Come in and see us start; it's capital fun. We'd a regular crowd round us yesterday. Any one else but Peg would have been frightened to death."

Incited by curiosity Lord Glencore obeyed Freddy's invitation.

"We keep all the front well shut," said Freddy, as he marshaled his way to a den at the far end of the narrow hall. Passing the stairs, he gave vent to a shrill whistle, answered by a similar one which might have been taken as its echo.

"Ain't you ready?" was piped up from below.

"Coming," answered a girl's voice, and at the same instant with the word, down the flight of stairs, flop on the mat, came a figure which, through the cloud of dust sent up, Lord Glencore surmised must be Peggy.

"I'm so sorry. I thought it was only Freddy—I"— and then, better able to see who stood there, she gave vent to an agonized, "Oh, Lord Glencore!" and seemed unable to say more.

Freddy, who was enjoying her confusion to the full, here burst in with, "Don't mind him; he's square enough, ain't you?"

"Certainly I am," and then turning to Peggy, he said, "I've never had the pleasure of seeing you here, have I?"

"No."

"But you've seen him, haven't you, Peg? And once don't you remember when the door opened and I scuttled off and your frock caught and you tumbled down? Oh, I say, what a game! It was a shave we weren't caught that time."

Poor Peggy's face was like a beet root.

"There wasn't anything to see," she said to Lord Glencore, reassuringly. "It really wasn't for that we looked, but I—I was so curious to know what you was like," and she gesticulated violently to Freddy behind Lord Glencore's back.

"What's the harm?" responded the young man, expostulatively. "You'd do the same if you were packed off into a cock loft of a garret, wouldn't you? That's what they do with her—stick her anywhere out of the way."

"No, Freddy, no," Lord Glencore from out of the corner of his eyes saw her say, and, hoping to change the conversation, he said:

"I'm afraid I'm making you lose the best of the day. I came in to see you start." Perhaps Peggy fathomed his kind effort, for she looked at him fairly for the first time.

"Yes!" and she gave him a little shy smile; "did you?"

"It's very pleasant, a drive out of town, now. Where are you going?"

"To Richmond park," answered the irrepressible Freddy. "Would you like to go? We'll take you; there's heaps of room behind. Why—why shouldn't he?" This was evidently in answer to more pantomime from Peggy.

"You don't want me—would rather I didn't go?"

Lord Glencore had turned suddenly round and was asking this question of the young girl.

"Oh, no; it isn't that, only I'm fraid"—and here Peggy stopped and blushed furiously. For a wonder Glencore did not catch the complaint. Quite persuasively he said: "But do let me; it's what I should so enjoy."

There was an instant's pause, and then they all began laughing; and good fellowship being thus established, some twenty minutes later the three, Lord Glencore behind, Freddy driving and Peggy by his side, were on the road to Richmond.

III.

It might be tedious to retail all the folly that fell from the lips of the trio as under Freddy's guidance they pursued their way. Their united years did not make up the sober age of 60, and they had the spirits of schoolboys out for a holiday. Lord Glencore had never felt so much at his ease before; none of those who in society knew him would have recognized him as the same shy individual. The hours flew like minutes. It was 5 o'clock when they thought it 3, and then to have looked at the time would not have occurred to anybody, only that Peggy, heaving a tremendous sigh, had supposed it would soon be time to think of returning home.

The horse that was so good at going, we have omitted to state, had, at a certain small hostelry, "Goat and Compass name, shown signs of rebellion. Stir from that door he would not, and Lord Glencore, to cut short the difficulty, had proposed that they should leave the brute there to get a feed, while they took a stroll in the park.

Returning from this walk they passed the "Star and Garter."

"I say, a dinner in there wouldn't be half bad fun," said Freddy.

"Oh, I don't think so," said Glencore.

"Why, have you ever been there?"

"Yes, I dined there twice this season with Lady Jane and your sister."

And a chill ran through the young man as he recalled the dreariness of those solemn ordeals.

"Oh!" said Freddy, drawing in his back as if about to succumb, while Peggy burst out laughing.

A bright inspiration came suddenly to Glencore.

"Why shouldn't we stop here now," he said, have dinner, and go home after?"

Freddy and Peggy came to a standstill, absolutely dumb with the brilliancy of the proposition.

"That's what we'll do," continued the enthusiastic Glencore; and he made as if to turn in at the door, but Peggy stopped him.

"I don't think we can," as she looked at Freddy significantly.

"No," came the answer a trifle crestfallen. "I expect they wouldn't stand tick in there," was added by way of explanation.

"That isn't of any consequence to you," exclaimed Glencore. "It's as my guests I invite you. Think how many times your mother has entertained me."

"Oh, I am not proud," laughed the delighted Freddy. "Isn't this first rate, Peg. Come on."

But Peggy still hesitated.

"I don't know whether I ought—whether it's quite right with you," and though her face was turned to both, her eyes were fixed on Glencore.

"And I your uncle that is," exclaimed Freddy, "and he going to be. Shut up, do."

And, considering this speech to be conclusive, Freddy cut short further discussion by at once turning into the hotel.

IV.

Well, if any dinner ever was a success that one was. What they had or how the courses came not one of them knew, but, to quote Freddy, everything was A1. Freddy magnanimously insisted that going home he would sit behind and leave the ribbons to be handled by Glencore.

The clock struck 9 before they were fairly off, and then, Peggy exclaiming at the lateness of the hour, Glencore said:

"But it won't matter much, will it?"

"No," said Peggy, a trifle bitterly. "Harris knows I'll look after Freddy, and there's no one to bother about what becomes of me."

"You have neither father nor mother, have you?"

Glencore put the question gently, and, not waiting for her answer, went on to tell her that he too had lost his parents when a child and was, like her, lonely, with no one to care for him.

"Yes," she said, "but you're a man with lots of money, and I'm poor and dependent; and then it's horrid to be a girl. Ever since I can remember I've heard nothing else but all I owe to everybody, as if it was my fault that I owe anything to them. I can't help having been born. Here I am, and until I die here I must stay. No, dependent, though. I've only waited to be taught something. I've had to owe that much to grandmamma."

Lord Glencore remained silent, and thinking that probably her troubles were of no interest to him, Peggy changed the subject. Directing his attention to Freddy, now silently sleeping, she managed to prop the lad up into a more comfortable position, and assented to Lord Glencore's remark that he did not seem like the rest of the family.

Then silence fell on them, and for a time not a word was spoken. Suddenly, as if from out of what she was thinking, Peggy said abruptly:

"Are you very much in love with Adda?"

"I! I'm not in love with her at all."

"But you're going to marry her?"

"Who says I am?"

"Why, everybody; and grandmamma, I knows, means you to."

"I see, and that makes you think it quite certain?"

Peggy laughed contemptuously. "It wouldn't make it certain with me," she said, "but men seem different; what she chooses, they do. Oh, I haven't patience to think of it," and the great brown eyes she turned on Glencore sparkled indignantly. "Why, do you think unless I loved somebody dearly, I'd marry him to please grandmamma? Never! She knows that as well as I do. She may ill treat me, but she can't make me do what I won't; I'd die rather. Shall I tell you what I mean to do?"—she was speaking very fast and excitedly—"I mean to run away. You'll promise not to tell any one, won't you? I mean to go very soon now—if I can, before they come home. Other girls earn their own livings, so why shouldn't I? I'm not stupid, and I'm awfully strong."

"But where will you go?"

"Oh, I know, but that I don't mean to tell. Perhaps I oughtn't to have said a word about it to you, but it slipped out, and you won't betray me, will you? Most of all, don't breathe a word to Adda; she hates me, and—well, there's no use disguising it—I hate her. When you're married to her"——

"Which I never shall be," interrupted Lord Glencore decidedly. Peggy faced round and looked her surprise at him.

"Don't look like that at me," he said hastily; "I mean w[illegible] I say."

"You do? Oh, I am awfully sorry."

"For her or for me?"

"I don't think I was thinking of either of you. It was for myself—there's so few ever care to be kind to me."

"And you think I should be?"

Peggy didn't trust herself to speak, but her head nodded assent.

"Let me tell a secret to you, Peggy"—he quite unconsciously called her by name. "Do you know that I mean to run away to?"

"You!"

"Yes, only I want somebody to run away with me. Can you guess why?"

"No."

"Somebody I've seen today."

"Today!"

The eyes of each looked into the other's questioningly.

"Can't you guess who?"

Lord Glencore's voice came tremulously.

"Oh, you know," he said, "I see you do."

"Me!" spoke the word breathlessly.

"Yes, you. You will go, won't you? You've no one to care for you, and I've no one to care for me. Why shouldn't we care for each other? I'd try and make you happy, and I'd certainly be good to you, and in time you might get to—well, to like me, you know."

"In time? Why, I like you now."

"You do? Oh, Peggy!"

* * * * * *

"I say! what's up with you two?" It was Freddy speaking—Freddy, whose very existence they had forgotten, but who, in common with all sleepers, awoke at the very moment he was not wanted to.

"What do you think?" said Glencore in a whisper; "had we better tell him?"

"Yes," said Peggy; "up to now my only friend has been Freddy."

So Freddy, thoroughly wide awake now, was desired to lean forward, and between them the two conveyed what it was their intention to do.

"I say, what a chouse for Adda!" roared Freddy delightedly; "but here, you know, you'll have to marry Peggy."

"Certainly; of course, that's what we mean to do."

"Do we?' said Peggy; "oh, my! why I never thought of that!"

"Didn't you?" said Freddy, assuming the air of a Mentor, "but I did though. You must be Lady Glencore before I see the last of you."

"But, Freddy, think of grandmamma, you would get into the most awful trouble. No, it would never do."

"Stuff and rubbish!" and Freddy snapped his fingers; "what, I should like to know, can a couple of women do? Besides, I'm not going to blab on myself—never fear. How can I help it if, while I am ruralizing with my tutor, you choose to bolt with Glencore?"

V.

Arrived at Thorndean, happy and unsuspecting, Lady Jane and her daughter waited for Lord Glencore in vain. Even to the "dear Lady Somerton" not a line had come from him. As every one said, it was so strange, so incomprehensible. "You don't think anything could have happened to him, Lady Jane?"

With a brave spirit worthy of a better woman, Lady Jane answered that she did not feel anxious in the least. Lord Glencore had spoken to her of having several most important things to settle, and naturally at times such as these—Lady Jane was forced into a little vagueness of speech—a thousand things cropped up, which one had never dreamed of before. Still her heart began to have misgivings, and her courage to sink a little lower, when all was revived by a paragraph in one of the papers informing all whom it did not concern that Messrs. Bullion & Gold had been intrusted with the family jewels by Lord Glencore with the view of ascertaining which had best be reset to suit their future lovely owner.

"Adda!" Lady Jane signaled to her daughter to follow her, and in her own room she pointed out the notice.

"Mother! Oh, I am so glad. I kept on thinking of those jewels. Everybody says the diamonds are more than lovely."

"It's more than a fortnight now," said Adela, discontentedly.

Lady Jane sighed. "There seems to be nothing else for me than worry."

"What more?"

"Oh, well, I didn't want to bother you, and if everything else was going right I shouldn't let this trouble me. It's a letter I had from Harris. She says that Peggy, if you please, has chosen to run away from home. Harris hopes I won't worry myself, or blame her, as the young lady has had it in her mind for some time. That's gratitude, you know—after all I've done for her."

"I'm sure I should let her be. She'll never come to any good end, that girl. Haven't I always said so?"

"My dear," said Lady Jane, "I must go to town. I dare say Lady Somerton will guess why, although I shall invent some reason to give her. I fear I was indiscreet in losing sight of this young man. But don't despair; nothing beyond remedy. If I can only find out where he is, rest assured this will never happen again."

"I always thought you were too sanguine," said Adda, ready to vent her displeasure on everybody. "I don't believe he ever wanted to marry me, only you would have it he did."

Lady Jane went to London, was absent a week, and then returned a sadder but not a wiser woman. Not a trace could she find of Glencore, not a word had she heard of him.

"And Peggy?" said Adda; "what about her?"

"Not a syllable. She had been gone a week and more before Harris wrote to me. It seems, however, a planned thing. She had had it in her mind at least a year."

"I wonder," said Adda, "will he ever turn up again?" Her thoughts had reverted to Lord Glencore.

"Of course he will," said Lady Jane decidedly, "and we must profit by the lesson we have learned from him. Now, my, dear, go off and tell Stevens to come to me. I have a trying ordeal before me to answer all the questions that the people here will put. I heard them in fits of laughter over their afternoon tea. I begged Lady Somerton to excuse me until dinner. I really didn't feel as if I could face them then. Ah, Adda," and Lady Jane nodded her head mournfully, "perhaps some day, when you have daughters of your own, you may know. Talk of martyrs! You have only to look at mothers."

That evening, when Lady Jane joined the guests assembled in the drawing room, she noticed that every one looked at her with an air of inquiry. It had been agreed, at the request of the hostess, that not a word on the subject uppermost in the minds of all of them should be mentioned until after dinner. Poor Lady Jane, sitting in a fool's paradise, actually fancied the object of her absence had lost its interest to everybody. Alas! a mine was about to explode, and Lady Somerton, nettled at the want of confidence shown, was the one to set the match. Advancing to the comfortable armchair in which, the ladies having returned to the drawing room, her smiling guest was reclining, she said:

"Of course, dear Lady Jane, you have seen the announcement in The Times of today?"

"No, indeed. I waited until I got here to look at the paper," and she stretched out her hand for it, languidly. "Anything of interest?"

"To you, yes, of great interest, I should say. Listen. 'On the 12th of September at St. Simon's church, Battlesea, Peggy, only child of the late Wynford Magnus, Esq., to Harold William, tenth earl of Glencore.'"

Adda gave a bound.

"Peggy!" she shrieked. "Mother? Oh!"

But Lady Jane interrupted her. With a supreme effort the modern martyr rose to the occasion.

"Be calm, dear child," she said. "See what your coldness has driven him to. However, poor fellow, in spite of his disappointment he was determined, it seems, to marry one of the family."—Longman's Magazine.

—"Despite medical warnings," says a German newspaper, "marriages between blood relations continue to be quite frequent in Germany. Education.

A Detroit father has undertaken a little educational venture with his own children, and he is trying to make them give up slang, the use of ambiguous terms of speech, and other peculiarities affected by the youth of the day. Yesterday he asked his 14-year-old daughter where a certain book was.

"I haven't an idea, papa!" answered the young lady.

"I didn't ask you for ideas," said the father sternly, "just answer that question. Where is that book?"

"On the top shelf in the book case," recited the girl, like a parrot.

"Can you reach it?"

"Yes, sir."

There was a long silence, the father waiting impatiently for the book. At last he asked:

"Nell, why don't you bring it?"

"Bring what, sir?"

"The book I wanted."

"You did not say you wanted me to get it," said the daughter in a demure voice, "you asked me if I could reach it."

"Nellie," said the father, as a smile made his mustache tremble, "get that book like a good girl and bring it here to me."

"Now you're talking sense, pop; I'll have the book in a jiffy," and she whisked off after it, while the father sighed over the degeneracy of the times.—Detroit Free Press.

Job's Plague.

The superintendent was talking to the little ones about the plagues of Egypt.

"Now," said he, "can you tell me what the plagues were?"

There were prompt answers, and all but one of the plagues were named. The last one was too much for the school. Thinking to help out the children by suggestion, the superintendent said:

"Don't you remember the other? Of course you know what Job had."

A little hand went up.

"Well, Tommy, what was it?"

"Patience."

He was given a "reward of merit."—Providence Journal.

Answered Correctly.

A teacher in one of the public schools of Detroit was giving a lesson on patriotism. The children seemed to know very little about Washington, except the hatchet story and the fact that he was a great and good man, which they read in the second reader. At last the teacher said:

"You stay home from school on Washington's birthday, but you never do so on my birthday. Why not?"

And with surprising emphasis came the answer: "'Cause he never told a lie."—Detroit Free Press.

THE CHRONIC LITIGATOR.

A Character That All of Us Know and—Well, Not Exactly Love.

This world of ours is peopled with men of all sorts and conditions, and there would be a vacancy in the ranks if the chronic litigator should become an obsolete being, with nothing but a big Latin name and a mendacious tombstone epitaph by which to remember him.

You all know him—every one knows him, and very few people have escaped him. He begins, when a boy, on his fiendish career, and never ceases until death has overpowered him, and perhaps not even then.

You remember the red headed boy at school, who, when he happened to be knocked down, would make out his injuries to be ten times worse than they really were, and, blaming some one, would go and try to have him punished? He was a chronic litigator in embryo.

In later years, when courting some unfortunate young woman, he always scrupulously preserves her letters, with a view to suing her for breach of promise if, when she discovers his true nature, she gives him the mitten. He always frightens her into matrimony, which, with him as a husband, is purgatory.

Some day he notices that the ceiling in the parlor is about to fall. He doesn't inform the landlord, but he says, "Let it fall. If it hurts the carpet or breaks the clock, we can sue him for four or five hundred dollars."

If he discovers that there is a hole in the asphalt or a tilting plank on the walk, he takes pains to fall into the former and break his leg, or to step on the end of the latter and let it fly up and hit him on the head, so that he can "sue the city for ten thousand." "And," he remarks to the doctor, "make your bill all the heavier, so that we can put in a big expense account."

He may be seen every noon on the street. Waiting on the sidewalk until the street is crowded with vehicles, he will suddenly jump into their midst, and, with a most demoniacal leer on his countenance, look at the drivers of the drays and wagons, as much as to say, "Run over me if you dare and I'll sue you."

If his unfortunate neighbor is so unwary as to let a single chicken leap its confines and scratch a single worm out of the chronic litigator's garden, he is going to get sued. And the litigator is always careful to plant his best vegetables as near his neighbor's hen coop as he can.

Watch him on the railroad. When the train happens to jar a little and the engine whistles, and every one thinks there is going to be an accident, see the way his countenance lights up! He perceives a chance for a suit against the road. And when it is ascertained that only a slight hitch has occurred and everything is all right, he sinks back into his seat and solaces himself with reading the court news.

Wherever he goes he is diligently shadowed by a bevy of lawyers, who know that they are going to have employment before night. All the judges fear him, and every newspaper office keeps his name on the standing galley, with the court headings.

He may sue us for writing this about him.—Paul C. West in Lawrence American.

And a love for the girl without;
There's a love for the girl who never goes back

There's a love for the girl who's got the tin,
And a love for the girl who's none;
There's a love for the girl of the rolling-pin,
Who knows when the pies are done.

There's a love for the girl of the rural part,
And a love for the girl in town;
There's a love for the girl of frolicsome heart,
And a love for the girl with a frown.

There's a love for the girl of "hoss-car" fare,
And a love for the girl on the street;
There's a love for the girl of dimples rare,

THE RICHES OF GARBAGE.

The Wealth in the Waste and Refuse of the City.

[Chicago Tribune.]

A great deal of money is thrown away every year by the waste of the refuse of our cities. In Boston some system of utilizing it has been adopted, and it is said that the demand for the garbage far outrans the supply. Milkmen even steal it from the contractors and carry it away in their milk-cans. European cities have for a long while economized in this as in other minute ways that mount up to enormous totals. New York throws away all of its refuse. Chicago has used a large part of it for filling up the lake front and for bringing up the streets to the new grade rendered necessary by raising the city. The market gardens in the vicinity of the city take more and more every year of what is furnished by the stables. But neither here, nor in New York, nor in other city except in Boston is anything like an adequate use made of the wealth that could be extracted from the dust heaps.

A machine has been invented and put into practical operation in New York that may do something towards solving the question of how to handle those street bonanzas. It is a rag and bone picker of several hundred Italian power that will sift and sort out refuse of all kinds to the extent of 150 tons a day. Until this machine went into operation all the refuse of New York, ashes, and garbage, and street sweepings—was dumped into scows and taken out to sea and there abandoned to the ebbing tide. But the success of the machine proves that a much more profitable use may be made of it, to say nothing of the advantage of putting a stop to the deposit of bars of bones, and old iron, and dirt at the mouth of the harbor.

There is nothing very complicated in the mechanism by which this is done. The rags and paper are picked out and put to one side to dry. The dust is sifted out to be carted off. All the solid matter is thrown into a "washer" in which the straw, the leather, the vegetable refuse and other light matter rise to the surface and are swept away into a crematory where they are burned. The heavy objects—the iron, glass, coal, cinders, and other things—are carried along on a broad belt from which they are picked off by Italians and sorted into heaps. In this way out of 150 loads of refuse, all of which hitherto has had to be carted to the boats and hauled out to sea there are but thirty loads left to be a source of expense to the city; that which is taken is heavy and sinks at once to the bottom, rising no more to haunt the festive bathers at Long Branch and Coney Island.

The figures of the value of that which is saved are the most interesting to the owners of the machine and to the public as well, for they are an encouragement to enterprising men to extend the area within which these artificial Italian rag and bone assorters may be introduced in our cities, which will be clean the moment it is discovered that there is money for somebody in keeping them clean. The rags are sold for $30 a ton. The old iron is worth $8 a ton; the broken glass $6 a ton. In every load of 1,800 pounds of refuse brought to the machine it finds 100 pounds of coal and cinders, which have furnished the machine with all the fuel it has needed and will supply some for sale in addition.

P. H. Mack has withdrawn as a partner in the INYO INDEPENDENT.

Mr. C. Anthony, of Darwin, was at Independence last Monday.

The citizens are busy in town trimming no shade trees and it looks as if spring has come to stay.

Mr. T. C. Boland came up from Keeler yesterday. He repor s everything very quiet down there since the railroads have been blockaded.

Mr. Robert O'Neal came down from Bishop on Thursday and installed the officers of the Odd Fellows Lodge at Independence the same evening.

George Gilliam got to Independence last Monday from Bakersfield. He reports very little doing over there yet, but the prospect is good for a prosperous season.

A large scow has been built and put upon the river where the Independence bridge was carried away. This serves very well as a ferry till a bridge can be built.

If you want to convince men, and ask how you shall do it, we reply: Believe with all your heart and soul, and some soul will be surely kindled by your flame.—Robertson.

A telegram received just before going to press says that a train has got through on the Central Pacific railroad, and that the regular train will come down on the C. & C. road Monday. So the long blockade is ended.

Mr. W. S. Enos went north two weeks ago on his way to Sacramento. Yesterday morning he telegraphed Mrs. Enos from Reno, saying that he had not yet got beyond that place and did not know when he would get any further.

Jack Willett realizes now how Tantalus must have suffered; Eibeshutz stood on the bank of Owens River holding up a nice black bottle, while Jack stood on the other bank and the bridge was gone. It was too cruel to trifle with tender affection in that way.

The heaviest rain storm of the season set in last Friday evening. During that night and next day, and far into the night of Saturday the rain came down in a continuous pour. Lightning and loud peals of thunder accompanied the storm.

At Cerro Gordo the work of timbering Union shaft is reported to be nearly completed. Already, it is said, some men have been put to work prospecting in the mine, and this force will likely be largely increased when the shaft shall be completed.

Mr. H. H. Spears says that the statement made last week of more freight at Mojave than there were teams to haul it, is a mistake. He says he is prepared to haul all the Owens Valley freight that may be delivered at Mojave; and so far there has not been freight enough to pay the teams that have gone there.

There has been no train down on the C & C. road since Wednesday, January 22 At last report the Central Pacific was still blockaded, and no certainty when it would be opened. The C. & C. people say they will send through a train as soon as the first train on the C. P. road reaches Reno from the west.

Parties who came down the valley yesterday say the damage to the C. & C. road is greater than was first reported. In the neighborhood of Chrysopolis the road is said to be washed out for a long distance. All the men that can be got are put to work repairing the damage, and in all probability the road will be ready for the first train that comes down.

At latest reports this morning the prospect was that the Central Pacific road would not be got opened sooner than eight days longer. The snow has now lain so long and is packed so hard that the plows cannot move it, and it has to be worked with picks and shovels, like solid ground. The loss of business and great expense of removing the snow has caused vast loss to the C. P. Company.

S. P. McKnight and assistants have been busy surveying along the Eastside canal during the past few weeks. They have been running section lines and distributing ditches on many locations where the locators will make improvements this Spring. From the drop in the canal near Eclipse a line for another ditch has been surveyed back northward and nearly parallel to the canal a distance of about five miles. It appears to be the intention to run the full head of water in the canal down to the drop, use it there for power and then convey it back in this newly surveyed ditch for irrigation.

A good deal of apprehension was felt that the head-gate of the Eastside Canal would be carried away in the flood. The gate and surrounding country were all under water at last report. The river is falling rapidly, and it is now believed that the head-gate is all right. It would be a serious matter if this gate should be washed out; it might be very difficult, if not entirely impossible, to get in another gate before the river should go down to low water mark next fall, and in such event all improvement along the line of the canal would be interrupted. It is believed, however, that the danger of such misfortune is over. It is only at long intervals that such floods occur in Owens River.

No trains have passed over the southern division of the C. & C. road in nine days, snow drifted upon the track where it crosses the spur of mountains south of Belleville. Last evening three engines and a snow plow left Belleville to clear the track. The snow has lain so long that it is now packed hard, and this morning the engines and plow were yet several miles from the summit. Had not the long blockade on the Central Pacific prevented the running of trains, the C. & C. would not have been closed for an hour. And during this blockade on the Central Pacific, if the C. & C. road had been connected with Mojave the amount of travel and freight that would have passed over it would have gone far to have paid for the extension.

Flood.

Owens River began rising rapidly on Sunday. On Monday morning the bridge on the County road from Independence to the railroad was carried away. North of Bishop station water from the Inyo Mountains overflowed the Stoutenborough ranch and did some damage. At Alvord water from the same mountains did some injury to the C. & C. road and filled up the Sanger ditch with sand. The damage to the railroad was not such as to entail heavy cost for repairs. There was no serious injury done through the valley by the flood. The carrying away of the bridge will cause some inconvenience at Independence, but a temporary bridge or ferry will give access to the railroad so that mails can be carried and people pass till a new bridge can be built. On the whole the rain in the valley and snow on the mountains are of vast benefit to the country. Not in many years has there been such.

Apportionment.

The County Auditor has made the following apportionment:

State Fund	$8121 98
Salary Fund	5353 03
Bond Fund	4710 67
Gen. Expense Fund	4710 67
Co. Road Fund	1284 74
Bridge Fund	642 36

Gen. Road Fund	321 18
Road Dist. No. 1 Fund	90 38

" " " 4 "	117 64
" " " 5 "	231 98
" " " 6 "	166 48
" " " 7 "	76 83

Mr. Austin, Taylor and Miss Ada Clark were married at Bishop this week.

A Long List.

The Delinquent Tax List is much longer than in other years, for the following reason: Many land locators contend that they should not be taxed for land to which they have not yet acquired title, and possibly may never acquire it. Many of the locations are desert land, and all such are utterly worthless to the locators till canals are built and water carried upon the land. Hence the locators hold it as unjust to be taxed for land that not only does not yield any return, but is now, and for some time to come will continue to be a source of heavy expense. To test this question the locators have let the tax go delinquent, and hence the long list.

Avalanches.

The vast mass of snow on the Sierra Mountains is causing tremendous avalanches. Last Tuesday an avalanche swept down on the North Fork of Oak Creek, about five miles north from Independence. The sound of the rushing snow and rocks could be heard in town. The enormous mass came down the mountain with a noise like thunder. The track of this avalanche can be very plainly seen from town. These avalanches are all up in the mountains and do not the slightest injury. They are grand sights to look at, and worth traveling far to see.

Installation.

On Thursday evening there was a public installation of the officers of the Odd Fellows Lodge at Independence. The following were installed: J. E. Shepherd, N. G.; John Alexander, V. G.; J. D. Blair, Sec.; Bert Rhine, Treas.; A. R. Conklin, Conductor; P. Clinton, Warden; Walter James, I. G.; P. H. Mack, R. S. N. G.; Geo. Lewis, L. S. N. G.; N. E. Conklin, R. S. V. G.; H. J. Robinson, L. S. V. G. After the installation the members went to Mairs' Hall and had a pleasant dancing party, which was kept up till about one o'clock.

The Broder Conklin Case.

The case of Broder versus Conklin was set for trial next Monday. By reason of the blockade on the Central Pacific railroad the lawyers in the case were unable to reach here in time, and by stipulation the case has again been postponed till April 14th next. Judge Hannah has notified the Governor that his health would not permit him to preside at the trial of the case, and requested that another Judge be appointed to try it. It is not yet known here what Judge the Governor has appointed.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m., at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening; Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

CHAPTER III.

THE TALE OF SIR JAMES DE LA MOLLE.

"Is that you, father?" said a voice, a very sweet voice, but one of which the tones betrayed the irritation natural to a healthy woman who has been kept waiting for her dinner. The voice came from the recesses of the dusky room in which the evening gloom had gathered deeply, and looking in its direction Harold Quaritch could see the outlines of a tall form sitting in an old oak chair with its hands crossed.

"Is that you, father? Really it is too bad to be so late for dinner, especially after you blew up that wretched Emma last night because she was five minutes after time. I have been waiting so long that I have almost been asleep."

"I am very sorry, my dear, very," said the old gentleman, apologetically, "but—halloo! I've knocked my head; here, Mary, bring me a light."

"Here is a light," said the voice, and at the same moment there was a sound of a match being struck.

In another moment the candle was alight, and the owner of the voice had turned round with it, holding it in such a fashion that its rays surrounded her like an aureole, showing Harold Quaritch that face of which the memory had never left him. There was the same powerful, broad brow, the same nobility of look, the same brown eyes and soft waving hair. But the girlhood had gone out of it; the face was now the face of a woman, who knew what life was and had not found it too easy. It had lost some of its dreaminess, he thought, though it had gained in intellectual force; as for the figure, it was much more admirable than the face, which was, strictly speaking, not a beautiful one. The figure, however, was undoubtedly beautiful, indeed, it is doubtful if many women could show a finer. Ida de la Molle was a large, strong woman, and there was about her a swing and a lissome grace which is very rare, and as attractive as it is rare. She was now nearly six-and-twenty years of age, and, not having begun to wither in accordance with the fate which overtakes nearly all unmarried women after 30, was at her very best. Harold Quaritch, glancing at her well poised head, her perfect bust and arms (for she was in evening dress), and her gracious form, thought to himself that he had never seen a nobler looking woman.

"Why, my dear father," she went on as she watched the match burn up and held it to the candle, "you made such a fuss this morning about the dinner being punctually at 7:30, and now it's 8 o'clock, and you are not dressed. It is enough to ruin any cook," and she broke off for the first time, perceiving that her father was not alone.

"Yes, my dear, yes," said the old gentleman, "I dare say I did. It is human to err, my dear, especially about dinner on a fine evening. Besides, I have made amends and brought you a visitor, our new neighbor, Col. Quaritch. Col. Quaritch, let me introduce you to my daughter, Miss de la Molle."

"I think that we have met before," said Harold, in a somewhat nervous fashion, as he stretched out his hand.

"Yes," answered Ida, taking it, "I remember. It was in the long drift, five years ago, on a windy afternoon, when my hat blew over the hedge and you went to fetch it."

"You have a good memory, Miss de la Molle," said he, feeling not a little pleased that she should have recollected the incident.

"Evidently not better than your own, Col. Quaritch," was her ready answer. "Besides, one sees so few strangers here that one naturally remembers them. It is a place where nothing happens—time passes—that is all."

Meanwhile the old squire, who had been making a prodigious fuss with his hat and stick, which he managed to send clattering down the flight of stone steps, departed to get ready, saying in a kind of roar as he went that Ida was to order in the dinner, as he would be down in a minute.

Accordingly she rang the bell, and told the maid to bring in the soup in five minutes, and to lay another place. Then turning to Harold, she began to apologize to him.

"I don't know what sort of a dinner you will get, Col. Quaritch," she said; "it is so provoking of my father; he never gives one the least warning when he is going to ask any one to dinner."

"Not at all, not at all," he answered hurriedly. "It is I who ought to apologize, coming down on you like—like"——

"A wolf on the fold," suggested Ida.

"Well," she went on, laughing, "you will get very little to eat for your pains, and I know that soldiers always like good dinners."

"How do you know that, Miss de la Molle?"

"Oh, because of poor James and his friends whom he used to bring here. By the way, Col. Quaritch," she went on, with a sudden softening of the voice, "you have been in Egypt, I know, because I have so often seen your name in the papers; did you ever meet my brother there?"

"I knew him slightly," he answered; "only very slightly. I did not know that he was your brother, or, indeed, that you had a brother. He was a dashing officer."

What he did not say, however, was that he also knew him to have been one of the wildest and most extravagant young men in an extravagant regiment, and as such had to some extent shunned his society on the few occasions when he had been thrown in with him. Perhaps Ida, with a woman's quickness, divined from his tone that there was something behind his remark; at any rate she did not ask him for particulars of their slight acquaintance.

"He was my only brother," she continued. "There never were but us two, and, of course, his loss was a great blow to me. My father cannot get over it at all, although"—and she broke off suddenly and rested her head upon her hand.

At this moment, too, the squire was heard advancing down the stairs, shouting to the servants as he came.

"A thousand pardons, my dear, a thousand pardons," he said, as he entered the room; "but, well, if you will forgive particulars, I was quite unable to discover the whereabouts of a certain necessary portion of the male attire. Now, Col. Quaritch, will you take my daughter? Stop, you don't know the way—perhaps I had better show it to you with the candle."

Accordingly he advanced out of the vestibule, and turning to the left, led the way down a long passage till he reached the dining room. This apartment was commodious, though not large. It was lighted by three narrow windows, which looked out upon the moat, and bore a considerable air of solid comfort. The table, made of black oak, which was of extraordinary solidity and weight, was matched by a sideboard of the same material and apparently of the same date, both pieces of furniture being, as Mr. de la Molle informed his guests, relics of the old castle.

On this sideboard were placed several very massive ancient plate, on each of which was rudely engraved three falcons or, the arms of the De la Molle family, one piece, indeed, a very ancient ewer, bearing those of the Boisseys—a ragged oak, in an escutcheon of pretense—showing thereby that it dated from the De la Molle who, in the time of Henry VII, had obtained the property by marriage with the Boissey heiress.

As the dinner, which was a simple one, went on, the conversation having turned that way, the old squire had this piece of plate brought by the servant girl to Harold Quaritch for him to examine.

"It is very curious," he said. "Have you much of this, Mr. de la Molle?"

"No, indeed," he said, "I wish I had. It all vanished in the time of Charles I."

"Melted down, I suppose," said the colonel.

"No, that is the odd part of it. I don't think it was. It was hidden somewhere—I don't know where, or perhaps it was turned into money and the money hidden. But I will tell you the story, if you like, as soon as we have done dinner."

Accordingly, as soon as the servant had removed the cloth, and, after the old fashion, placed the wine upon the naked wood, the squire began his tale, of which the following is the substance:

"In the time of James I the De la Molle family was at the height of its prosperity, that is, so far as money goes. For several generations previous the representatives of the family had withdrawn themselves from any active participation in public affairs, and living here at small expense upon their lands, which were at that time very large, had amassed a quantity of wealth that, for the age, might fairly be called enormous. Thus Sir Stephen de la Molle, the grandfather of the Sir James who lived in the time of James I, left to his son, who was also named Stephen, a sum of not less than £23,000 in gold. This Stephen was a great miser, and tradition says that he trebled the sum in his life time. Anyhow, he died rich as Crœsus, and abominated alike by his tenants and by the country side, as might be expected when a gentleman of his name and fame degraded himself, as this Sir Stephen undoubtedly did, to the practice of usury.

"With the next heir, Sir James, however, the old spirit of the De la Molles seems to have revived, although it is sufficiently clear that he was by no means a spendthrift, but, on the contrary, a careful man, though one who maintained his station and refused to soil his fingers with such base dealing as it had pleased his uncle to do. Going to court he became, perhaps on account of his wealth, a considerable favorite with James I, to whom he was greatly attached, and from whom he bought a baronetcy. Indeed, the best proof of his devotion is, that he on two occasions, lent large sums of money to the king which were never repaid. On the accession of Charles I, however, Sir James left court under circumstances which were never quite cleared up. It is said that, smarting under some slight which was put upon him, he made a somewhat brusque demand for the money that he had lent to James. Thereon the king, with sarcastic wit, congratulated him on the fact that the spirit of his uncle, Sir Stephen De la Molle, whose name was still a byword in the land, evidently survived in the family. Sir James turned white with anger, bowed, and without a word left the court, nor did he ever return thither.

"Years passed, and the civil war was at its height. Sir James had as yet steadily refused to take any share in it. He had never forgiven the insult put upon him by the king, for, like most of his race, of whom it was said that they never forgave an injury and never forgot a kindness, he was a pertinacious man. Therefore he would not lift a finger in the king's cause, but still less would he help the Roundheads, whom he hated with a singular hatred. So time went, till at last, when he was sore pressed, Charles, knowing his great wealth and influence, brought himself to write a letter to this Sir James, appealing to him for support, and especially for money.

"'I hear,' said the king in his letter, 'that Sir James de la Molle, who was aforetyme well affected to our person and more especially to the late king, our sainted father, doth stand idle, watching the growing of this bloody struggle and lifting no hand. Such was not the way of the race from which he sprung, which, unless history doth greatly lie, hath in the past been each found at the side of their kings striking for the right. It is said to me also that Sir James de la Molle doth thus place himself aside, blowing neither hot nor cold, because of some sharp words which we spake in heedless jest many a year that's gone. We know not if this be true, doubting if a man's memory be so long, but if so it be, then hereby do we crave his pardon, and no more can we do. And now is our estate one of grievous peril, and sorely do we need the aid of God and man. Therefore, if the heart of our subject Sir James de la Molle be not rebellious against us, as we cannot readily credit it to be, we do implore present his aid in men and money, of which last it is said he hath large store, this letter being proof of our urgent need.'

"These were, as nearly as I can remember, the very words of the letter which was written in his own hand, and show pretty clearly how hardly he was pressed. It is said that when he read it, Sir James, forgetting his grievance, burst into tears, and, taking the paper, wrote hastily as follows, which last he certainly did, for I have seen the letter in the museum: 'My liege—Of the past I will not speak. It is past. But since it hath graciously pleased your majesty to ask mine aid against the rebels who would overthrow your throne, rest assured that all I have is at your majesty's disposal, till such time as your enemies are discomfited. It hath pleased Providence to so prosper my fortunes that I have stored away in a safe place, till these times be past, a very great sum in gold, whereof I will at once place 10,000 pieces at the disposal of your majesty, so soon as a safe means can be provided of conveying the same, seeing that I had sooner die than that these great moneys should fall into the hands of the rebels to the furtherance of an evil cause.'

"Then the letter went on to say that the writer would at once buckle to and raise a troop of horse among his tenantry, and that, if other satisfactory arrangements could not be made for the conveyance of the moneys, he would bring them in person to the king.

"And now comes the climax of the story. The messenger was captured, and Sir James' incautious letter taken from his boot, as a result of which he, within ten days' time, found himself closely besieged by 500 Roundheads, under the command of one Col. Playfair. The castle was but ill provisioned for a siege, and in the end Sir James was driven by sheer starvation to surrender. No sooner had he obtained an entry than Col. Playfair sent for his prisoner, and to his astonishment produced to Sir James' face his own letter to the king.

"'Now, Sir James,' he said, 'we have the hive, and I must ask you to lead us to the honey. Where be these great moneys whereof you talk herein? Fain would I be fingering these 10,000 pieces in gold, the which you have so snugly stowed away.'

"'Ay,' answered old Sir James; 'you have the hive, but the secret of the honey you have not, nor shall you have it. The 10,000 pieces in gold is where it is, and with it as much more. Find it if you may, colonel, and take it if you can.'

"'I shall find it by to-morrow's light, Sir James, or otherwise—well, or otherwise you die.'

"'I must die; all men do, colonel; but if I die the secret dies with me.'

"'This we shall see,' answered the colonel grimly, and old Sir James was marched off to a cell, and there closely confined on bread and water. But he did not die the next day, nor the next, nor for a week, indeed.

"Every day he was brought up before the colonel and questioned as to where the treasure was, under the threat of immediate death, not being suffered meanwhile to communicate by word or sign with any one, save the officers of the rebels, and every day he refused, till at last his inquisitor's patience gave out, and he was told frankly that if he did not communicate the secret he would be shot at dawn the following day.

A notable decrease has taken place in the British convict population. In July last the total number in custody under sentence of penal servitude had dropped to 6,405, as compared with 11,660 twenty years ago. The number of women sentenced to penal servitude has fallen very much below even recent years, the number in 1888 being 57, and in 1883, 186. The whole number of women in England and Wales now under sentence of penal servitude is only 405, or less than a third of the daily average female convict population of ten years ago.

NICKELS AND PENNIES.

How They Are Made and What They Are Made Of.

The story of the nickel is an interesting one. Very few people in this country imagine how much profit Uncle Sam makes out of the stamping of these small coins. The actual cost of a nickel to the Government is not much more than three-quarters of a cent. Formerly the metal was fixed, planned and prepared for use in the National workshops at the various mints, but now the metal is purchased and prepared by outsiders under contract. All the Government does now is to put its stamp upon the blanks and then gather in its profit on their circulation.

The total amount of these coins issued in a year will average about $600,000, and as very few of them ever return to plague the Government, the actual profit to the National treasury can be easily calculated. Nickels and pennies are, of course, redeemable by the treasury in other money when a demand is made, but this occurs only occasionally, and then the coins are sent to the mint, cleaned up and sent into circulation again.

It is about the same story in reference to pennies. The Government buys the metal out of which they are made ready for use and pays so much a pound for it, when it is cut and prepared for stamping. Then the mint puts the legal mark upon the coins and they are turned out by the million. What do they cost? Well, every cent that is coined brings in a profit of three quarters of a cent to the Government. More pennies than nickels are returned to the treasury in exchange for other money, but they are sent promptly to the mint, and soon get into the hands of the public once again. A bronze penny or a nickel five-cent piece does not wear out as rapidly as a dollar bill.

The coinage of silver pieces is done mainly by the National mints, and, strange to say, there is more profit in the work than any thing else that the mint does. Under the present law the treasury is required to buy and coin at least $2,000,000 worth of silver into dollars. This $2,000,000 worth of silver makes nearly $2,250,000, so that the profit on the monthly purchase and coinage of silver dollars is fully $750,000. So the profit on the silver dollars, you see, is about $9,000,000 a year or more, and adding to it the profit on the pennies and nickels brings it up to nearly $10,000,000. Of course, there must be taken out of that the expenses of the mint, but they are comparatively a small sum.

The process of coining silver pieces is an interesting one, and is the same practically for dimes and dollars. The silver bullion is first melted and run into bars. These in turn are run through immense rollers and flattened out to the thinness of the coin. These silver strips are then passed through a machine which cuts them into the proper size for the presses, the strips first having been treated with a kind of tallow to prevent their being scratched in their passage through the cutters. The silver pieces are then put into the feeder of the printing presses, and are fed to the die by automatic machinery. As the smooth pieces are pressed between the ponderous printing dies they receive the lettered and figured impressions in a manner similar to that of paper pressed upon a form of type; at the same time the piece is expanded in a slight degree and the small corrugations are cut into its rim. The machine drops the completed coin into a receiver and it is ready for the counter's hand.

The instrument used by the counter is not a complicated machine by any means, as one might suppose. It is a simple copper-covered tray, having raised ridges running across its surface at a distance apart the exact width of a dime. From the receiver the money is dumped on to this board or tray, and as it is shaken rapidly by the counter, the pieces settle down into the spaces between the ridges. All these spaces being filled, the surplus is brushed back into the receiver, and the counter has exactly 1,250 dimes, $125 on this tray, which number is required to fill the spaces. The tray is then emptied into boxes, and the money is ready for shipment.

The dime does not pass through the weigher's hands, as does the coin of a larger denomination. One and one-half grains is allowed for variation or "tolerance" in all silver coins from one dollar down, and the deviation from the standard in the ten-cent pieces is so trifling that the trouble of weighing coins of this denomination is dispensed with.—N. Y. Star.

He Wasn't Crazy.

A gentleman from an adjoining town, who passed through Milledgeville the other day, told our correspondent of a little scene in the ordinary's court of his native county a few days ago that demonstrates the truth of the assertion that "great matters are often kindled from small fires." The case in question was against a young negro charged with lunacy, and twelve prominent gentlemen were sworn to investigate into his mental condition and give a verdict in accordance with the facts deduced.

The foreman of the jury, though a prominent gentleman, had failed to gain enviable reputation as a paymaster, and there is where the pinch came. In the cross-examination usually attendant on such trials, the foreman propounded a few questions to the simple minded negro that were readily answered.

"Do you know me?" asked the peer.

"Certainly I do," was the quick retort.

"Then, what is my name and where did you know me?"

The negro gazed at him with an air of confidence and then replied: "Your name is Mr. John Blank. I worked for you all of year before last, and I swar' 'fore God you has nebber paid me a cent for it. Of course, I knows you." In the laughter and confusion that followed a verdict of "not crazy" was made, but Mr. Blank vows that he will never serve on another jury, especially to test the mental strength of a negro, which he likens unto gauging the kicking capacity of a mule. —Milledgeville (Ga.) Chronicle.

Bernhardt and the Dressmaker.

Bernhardt never had a corset. She has never fastened a pair of stays around her in her life, which accounts for her suppleness and inimitable grace. For one reason she has always been so thin that there has been no need for corsets to confine her into a size small enough for her gowns. When she goes to the dressmakers she wears a smooth, but not tight waist of heavy white linen, which the dressmaker fills out in hollow places with a few folds of cotton batting, fitting the waist of the gown over it. But this is only worn for smoothness and not to reduce her waist. On the stage she does not wear even that, which accounts for her long, smooth strides and the ease of her poses, that rather melt and dissolve into each other than change.

A TRUE REASON.

We ask as a special favor to yourselves for all who happen to glance at the above heading, not to fail reading this notice and the testimonial below from one of the best known business women in this country:

December 10, 1889.

Sierra Chemical Co.:

Gentlemen—Nothing but a desire to benefit the afflicted induces me to give you the following statements of facts. I have been a sufferer with dizziness in my head, and my constitution was generally broken down. At times my back would ache so that I thought I would have to give up; and my symptoms were such that I became sure that my kidneys were diseased. Your Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure was recommended to me, and I have given it a square trial, and now say that it is all, and even more, than is claimed for it—a wonderful remedy. I intend to keep it in my house at all times, and will recommend it to all my friends, as I am doing daily.

Believe me, very thankfully yours,

Mrs. M. Mallory,

Sole Agent for McCabe Sanitive Corset, 2212 Mission street, San Francisco, Cal.

Progressive Mexico.

No subject interested Gen. Grant more in his later years than the development of the material resources of Mexico and her advancement in civilization. He had great hopes of her future, some of which would have been realized if he had lived till now.

Gen. Diaz is now serving his third term as president of Mexico, a fact that speaks volumes for this country, which used to be torn with internal dissensions. In 1879 Mexico had only 372 miles of railway, against more than 5,000 in 1889. The government revenues in 1870 were $16,000,000, in 1889 they will be nearly $38,000,000, more than doubling in nineteen years. Mexican exports in 1885 amounted to not quite $47,000,000. In 1889 they were $2,000,000 greater. Her chief exports are from her mines. In 1885 her goods shipped to the United States were of the value of $25,000,000. In three years they increased $7,000,000.

Though her mining interests are most important, yet the republic has hundreds of millions in her cattle ranches, her forests of rich furniture woods, and her plantations of coffee, sugar, cocoa and fruits. Best of all, President Diaz can truly announce to his people and the world that the republic is peace.

A CLERK'S LUCK.

He Suddenly Finds Himself Master of a Competence.

Samuel Baker, a clerk in one of the principal jewelry stores of this city, and who lives at 1,934½ Bush street, is in luck. At the last drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery Company he found himself suddenly possessed of the snug sum of $15,000, he having purchased a coupon of ticket No. 93, which drew the capital prize. As soon as his good fortune became known Mr. Baker's friends came about him to offer their congratulations. One of the number was a reporter of The Call to whom Mr. Baker said:

"For years past I have been in the habit of buying four or five coupons each month. This time I bought four, among which was No. 93. This coupon has quite a history. The agent took it first to a woman who keeps a variety-store on Larkin street. She refused to take it, as she said so small a number never won much of a prize. He then sold it to a man downtown, who kept it in his pocket for over two hours, when he returned it to the agent, asking for another and larger number. I guess he is kicking himself over it now. Then the agent came to me and sold me four tickets, among which was this one. I took them without paying much attention to the numbers, and I was much surprised when I saw that I had won a slice of the capital prize." What do you intend to do with the money?" asked the rporter.

"I shall let it rest for the present," answered Mr. Baker, "until I see some good opportunity for investing it advantageously and securely. It can draw interest until I have a chance to dispose of the capital in some enterprise that will prove both safe and profitable."—San Francisco (Cal.) Call, November 30.

Speech is silver and silver is likely to mean peech in Congress this session.

THE PACIFIC BANK

A Good Name

At home is a tower of strength abroad, is fully verified by the history of Hood's Sarsaparilla. The first words of commendation and praise for this medicine were received from our friends and neighbors, and from the time it was fairly introduced up to the present, there has been, and is now, more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell, Mass., where it is made, than of all other Sarsaparillas and blood purifiers combined. Whole neighborhoods are taking it at the same time, and it has effected many remarkable cures in the Spindle City. This "good name" among people who have known Hood's Sarsaparilla and its proprietors for years should certainly be strong evidence to people in other cities and towns of the excellence and merit of this medicine.

And that it has proven a "tower of strength abroad," is shown by the wonderful increase in the sales of Hood's Sarsaparilla all over the country. The public confidence has never been so quickly gained or so firmly held by any medicine as by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Hostetter & Co., Pittsburg, Pa., on receipt of a two-cent stamp, will forward a copy by mail to any person who cannot procure one in his neighborhood.

G. C. Bartholomew, Kalkaska, Mich., says: "I located in this place five years ago, having formerly resided in Troy, N. Y. I have been a great sufferer from what the physicians of Troy called Bright's disease. I used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y. All the terrible symptoms of the disease are gone. I have no traces of any disorder of the kidneys, liver or bladder. Who would begrudge the cost of this medicine (one dollar a bottle) for such a blessing or refuse this simple though sincere token of gratitude for being perfectly cured? I owe everything to Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, and hope this will induce others to use the medicine who suffer from any 'kidney, liver or blood disorder.'"

A NEW HOME TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. When you shall walk in pensive mood
The happy paths we used to know,
And sweet and gentle thoughts intrude,
And tender dreams of Long Ago,
How will your wakened spirit bear
Its bitter pang, its bleak despair?

When in your heart, as now in mine,
Shall throb the pulse of sleepless grief—
Since nothing earthly or divine
In that dark hour can bring relief—
How will you mour o'er wasted bliss
And that wild moment long for this!

The echo of a silent word,
An exhalation of the dew,
A lonely sigh at midnight heard
In depth of some funereal yew—
These shall be more, in that black day,
Than your true lover past away.

Then scorn no more the present hour,
Nor crush the roses while they bloom!
The best of time has only power
To hang a garland on a tomb;
And all that lasts when years are sped
Is hopeless memory of the dead.

THAT DREADFUL TRAMP.

How Miss Penn Tried to Put Him on the Right Pathway.

When Laura Penn found herself friendless in the world, all her possessions bounded by the four sides of a Saratoga trunk, and with a purse in her pocket holding exactly nineteen dollars and twenty-five cents, she felt it necessary to think of something besides her troubles, unless she desired to become dependent on charity. She was now paying a visit to a friend, but she was aware that visits should never be too long.

The details of the causes that had combined to throw her on her own resources at nineteen years of age are not necessary. Death, as you may suppose, had been very busy, and there had been the old story of a name signed for a friend, bankruptcy, a home sold at auction, and a broken heart.

Laura had nothing to do with all this but to look on and wonder; to weep first for her mother, and then for her father, and to find herself dressed in black and quite alone on earth.

One thing she had, however, that the auctioneer's hammer could not rob her of—a good education. She could certainly teach. The thought came into her mind one morning as she opened her eyes, and with it the question: "How shall I get a class or a school?" Advertisement seemed to be the usual way, so the girl advertised. If she had not been very ignorant of the ways of the world, she would certainly have given initials or the number of a post-office box; but as she was a mere baby in all that pertained to the working world, the advertisement ended with: "Address Miss Laura Penn, No. — —— street."

Happily her friends did not read the advertisements, so she was spared advice and lecture and information as to the impropriety of her conduct; and the advertisement resulted in a single call.

About nine o'clock the bell rang. A portly matron inquired for Miss Laura Penn, and the girl hurried down stairs, expecting to see the principal of a very important seminary for young girls anxious to secure her services. In the shadow of the curtained parlor she could see only a figure of large dimensions, which arose and advanced toward her.

"You don't know me," said a soft, kindly old woman's voice, "but I've knowed you from a babe. I served your pa and ma with milk when you took it from a bottle. I used to ride in with my old man when first we were married; later, when I was a widow, I served myself; now my boy serves. But all along I've seen you frequent, and if your pa failed, he paid up noble. And when I see that you needed to teach, and wanted a school, I said, 'The poor child!'"—here the old lady was forced to hunt for her handkerchief to wipe away her tears—"'The poor child! when she'd been brought up, so to speak, on cream, to come to earning her own bread. But since she's in want of a school to teach, thank fortune I've got one to give her, if she'll take it.'"

"O, I remember you very well now, Mrs. Cliff," said Laura, who was in tears herself. "And the milk was always so good, and how kind of you to tell me about a school. I suppose you serve it with milk."

"No, Miss Penn, I don't," said Mrs. Cliff. "It's only a day school, but I board the teacher and I make her drink all she can, for I believe milk to be wholesome, and the way some of 'em fatten up is astonishing. I don't say it because I have a dairy, but the truth is the truth. It's the district school at our place, and Miss Chester, who taught last year, is married, and I can get it for you if you like. Twenty-five dollars a month and board in. I'll arrange it shall be with me, as I did last year. There's no great distance to walk and my family is only me and my boy and my husband's sister, and you'll be quite quiet, as folks like to be after affliction. I know that myself."

"A country school. I love the country so much; I shall be very glad, indeed," said Laura. "And I am so much obliged, Mrs. Cliff."

So it was settled, and after a certain delay, and a curious ceremony, supposed to be a strict examination of the new teacher, had been duly performed, Laura found herself and her trunk in Mrs. Cliff's front, up-stairs bedroom and mistress of a little barn-like school-house in the midst of the woods.

The scholars were all young and there were not many of them. The books were not the best of their sort; the black-board was gray with age, and there was a map of the United States on the wall which, had it been studied by the scholars, would have misled them as to the number of territories.

However, most of the babies were still in their A. B. C's, or words of one syllable; and Laura hoped to influence the economical board to greater generosity in time. She had suffered so much that she could not expect happiness until time had come to her aid, and rude surroundings or inelegant appointments made little matter. The children were good enough; the little girls caressing. Flowers and big apples were on her desk every morning. Little mouths were lifted to her own in good-bye kisses. Any boy of them all was ready to do escort duty; but the wood-path, though long and lonely, only delighted her; and Mrs. Cliff was kind and motherly. On the whole, her lines had not fallen in unpleasant places.

For a month after Laura Penn began to teach the school the weather was clear and bright, as September often is; but with October came a Monday with a great storm. The roads were sodden, the trees dripped; people kept their little girls at home. The boys came splashing in under waterproof coats, and with rubber boots to their knees, and boasted of their bravery; and "the teacher" lighted a little fire in the big wood stove that they might dry themselves. That was fun for all. Meanwhile, not to lose time, she set them saying the multiplication table.

Suddenly a big voice joined in the chorus—"Twice ten are twenty; twice eleven are twenty-two; twice twelve are twenty-four;" and turning with a start, Laura saw a figure, soaked in mud—mud on its hair, mud on its nose, mud to its waist—standing in the door. A tramp, certainly. She had heard such dreadful things of tramps that she turned pale. Still, in such a rain she could have bolted the door in his face, if it had been in her power.

"A fire!" said the tramp, advancing. "I expected nothing as good as that. May I come nearer, or am I too muddy?"

"Bring a chair, Johnny," said the teacher. "It is dreadful weather. He must have been sleeping out of doors," she said to herself.

The tramp confirmed her suspicions by remarking, as he took the chair:

"This is weather, and I've been in the woods all night. I presume I need washing the worst way."

"The teacher" saw an opportunity for efforts in the sanitary line.

"Johnny," she said, "show the young man where the wash basin and water bucket are, and you may give him a clean towel from the shelf."

Johnny obeyed. He led the way; the tramp followed him, and returned much improved in appearance—quite clean, in fact—having been, as he said, "broomed down" by the useful Johnny.

He was steaming beautifully shortly, and continued to join in the exercises of the school, adding wood to the fire occasionally, until noon-time came. As yet he had done nothing desperate, but, as he eyed the cans and baskets, he remarked:

"I wish I had my lunch with me, I assure you. I missed my supper and had no breakfast. I am conscious of a vacuum."

"Now, perhaps," thought Laura, "the time has come."

She flew to her desk.

"I have some lunch here," she said, offering a napkin filled by good Mrs. Cliff with short-cake, cheese and mince pie, and a bottle of milk.

The tramp looked at it.

"The spirit is unwilling," he said, "but the flesh is weak. I'll take half."

And accordingly Laura made a fair division, thinking that this was a very amiable tramp, indeed, intended for better things. Indeed, he was handsome even in the case of dry mud he wore. She wished she were of the order of people who can give advice gratis. She wanted to reform him. But she could not bring herself to preaching. Only when he arose to leave, the rain falling no longer in torrents, but having subsided into a drizzle, she went to the door with him.

"Take this little path," she said. "It will lead you straight to the village. I am sure you must be tired of such hardships as you experienced last night; and if you will go to the parsonage, Mr. Pardon will put you in the way of—of—finding your way into a better path." And then she slipped twenty-five cents into his hand.

He looked at her curiously.

"You are very kind," he said, "I hope you will never need half of anybody's luncheon."

He was gone. His voice trembled, she was sure; but later she heard somebody laughing at a distance. It could not have been that tramp.

She went home when school was over and told the tale to Mrs. Cliff.

"A tramp!" cried that good woman. "It's a mercy you are alive. They've got the souls of gorillas, and I expect if you hadn't had so many boys about you, you'd not be here to tell of it. This region isn't often tramped, either. It's off the track. I hope there's no more in the woods,"

Miss Penn sat down to her supper. Half a luncheon had left her hungry, but while she ate the pork and beans with a will there came a knock at the door. At it stood a servant in a sort of livery. "Master's compliments," he said, and handed her a bouquet of hot-house flowers, from the stems of which depended a little note.

She opened the note at once. Within was a silver quarter of a dollar and these words:

MY DEAR MISS PENN: I return the twenty-five-cent piece, or rather another in its place. You were so good to the tramp that I hated to undeceive you. I went out shooting yesterday, lost my way in the woods, tumbled into a marsh, and was what you saw me when I reached the school-house at nine o'clock. I never was so hungry before. The half of your luncheon was delicious. Will you permit me to call to make my apologies? Mrs. Cliff knows who I am, and can introduce us.

Yours thankfully and sincerely,
ANDREW BELLAIRE.

Laura Penn read the note through twice.

"He was not a tramp, then, after all," she said. "What an idiot he must think me!" and she handed the note to Mrs. Cliff.

"He is a son of old General Bellaire, the richest man in the place: just home from traveling in Europe," cried the old lady; "and it's just as plain as a pike-staff that he is smitten, and wants to come a courting you."

Events proved that she was right. The little teacher who shared her luncheon with the tramp in the old school-house in the wood is now Mrs. Bellaire.—N. Y. Ledger.

CABINET AND MINISTRY.

The Difference—A Peculiar Feature of the British Government.

The governing executive body of Great Britain is spoken of sometimes as the "Cabinet," and sometimes as the "Ministry." The two terms are thus used indifferently in the papers and in books, as if they meant the same thing. And in one sense they do mean the same thing; that is, each is used to describe the body to which is committed the executive affairs of the Kingdom.

The word "government" is also often used to describe the same body. We had the "Gladstone government," the "Salisbury government," used with this meaning.

But in their composition the Cabinet is one body, and the Ministry is another. Every member of the Cabinet is a minister, but every minister is not a Cabinet officer. The Cabinet is what may be termed a select committee of the Ministry. It is the inner circle, the chosen spirits of the Ministry.

The Ministry consists of all the heads of the executive departments of the Kingdom. The members of the Cabinet are the heads of the most important of these departments; and they also compose, which the ministers not in the Cabinet do not, the select and secret advisors of the Crown on matters of national policy.

Mr. Gladstone, in one of his essays, speaks of every member of the Cabinet as exercising three public functions. He is the head of a department of the State. He is always a member of one of the Houses of Parliament, and so acts in a legislative capacity. And he is a confidential adviser of the Crown. It is in the latter capacity that he differs from a minister not in the Cabinet.

There are certain great departments of State, the chief of which always occupy seats in the inner circle of the Cabinet. These are the First Lord of the Treasury (who almost always also presides over the Cabinet as Prime Minister); the five Secretaries of State—for foreign affairs, home affairs, war, the colonies, and India; the Chancellor of Exchequer; the Lord High Chancellor; the First Lord of Admiralty; the Lord President of the Council; and the Lord Privy Seal.

There are other departments, the heads of which sometimes are and sometimes are not in the Cabinet, though they are part of the Ministry. These are the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the Postmaster General, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the President of the Board of Trade, the President of the Local Government Board, and the Vice President of the Council.

Finally, there are offices held by Ministers who are never members of the Cabinet; for instance, the Junior Lords of the Treasury and Admiralty, the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General for England and Ireland.

The Ministry, as such, never meets in a body. The Cabinet, on the other hand, holds frequent meetings, according to the gravity of public affairs; always confers in secret, and has no record kept of its proceedings. Often its decisions are kept secret from the rest of the Ministers.

No law compels a Cabinet Minister to be a peer or a member of the House of Commons. But custom has made this an invariable rule. When a member of the House of Commons is called to the Cabinet, he resigns his seat in the House and goes to his constituents for a reelect on.

Every member of the Cabinet must be a Privy Councillor, and if he has not previously been one, is so created when he enters the Cabinet. Privy Councillors have the title of "Right Honorable."

The English law does not recognize any such body as the Cabinet, or any such official as Prime Minister. Both the collective power of the Cabinet and the dignity of first Minister have grown up gradually, and have taken their places in the British political system without the appliance of any statute.—Youth's Companion.

THE CARE OF THE HAIR.

It Should Be Washed But Once in Six Weeks With Castile Soap.

The care of the hair is an important branch of fashion at all times, though often fashion dictates an injudicious treatment and prescribes modes against all rules of health and reason. Such importance has been given to the hair that some philosophers make the chignon, coils and puffs the index of civilization, and show how eccentricity in head-dress and coiffure marks the degradation of the time. It is well understood that masses of false hair injure natural growth, but a freak of fashion which seems harmless may be made equally hurtful. This apparently innocent fashion is that of fluffiness and lightness of the hair produced by continual washing. The best specialists on treatment of the hair say that the hair should be washed once in six weeks and not oftener, and that castile soap and not borax, soda or any other drying material should be used. After washing it is well to rub the scalp with some reliable ointment. The natural oil, which to some appears objectionable, is the life-giving ointment of the hair and should not be destroyed. Dry hair has a dead appearance, the ends split and growth is retarded. The fine comb is most hurtful, but a soft brush, used judiciously, gives vigor to the scalp and keeps it in a healthy condition. The practice of cutting the ends of the hair is useful, and can be accomplished easily by braiding the hair and then cutting the ends. The care of the hair is certainly as important as that of the teeth but is much more neglected. The rules of its preservation are simple and important. Vigorous brushing, cutting the ends when necessary, washing with castile soap once in six weeks, and the desirable avoidance of false hair should preserve and strengthen the hair. But if the hair comes out and becomes lifeless and thin in spite of this treatment, the best remedy is to seek a reliable specialist on scalp diseases, and to submit to thorough professional direction.—Boston Journal.

BRIDESMAIDS.

Some Old Notions Concerning Wedding Attendants.

Importance was formerly attached to the colors which the bride wore on her wedding day. Thus, in an old book entitled the "Fifteen Comforts of Marriage," a bride and her bridesmaids are represented conversing together respecting the colors to be used for the decoration of the bridal dress. It was finally decided, after various colors had been rejected, "to mingle a gold tissue with grass green," this being considered symbolical of youthful jollity.

Again, that the office of a bridesmaid was in times past not altogether a sine qua non may be gathered from the fact that during the period of the wedding festivities, which often extended over a week, the bridesmaids were expected to be in attendance and to do whatever they could to promote their success.

Then there was the custom of "flinging the stocking," at which the bridesmaids took a prominent lead; a ceremony to which no small importance was attached. It has been made the subject of frequent allusion by our old writers, and one rhyme, describing a wedding, tells us:

"But still the stockens are to throw;
Some throw too high, and some too low,
There's none could hit the mark."

Mason further informs us that if the bridegroom's stocking, thrown by one of the bridesmaids, fell upon his head, it is regarded as an omen that she herself would soon be married; and a similar prognostic was taken from the falling of the bride's stocking, thrown by one of the groomsmen. It was the bridesmaid's duty, too to present the bride with the "benediction posset," so called from the words uttered over it: a practice thus noticed by Herrick, in his "Hesperides:"

"What short sweet prayers shall be said,
And how the posset shall be made
With cream of lilies, not of kine,
And maiden's blush for spiced wine."

Suckling thus alludes to this custom:

"In came the bridesmaids with the posset
The bridegroom eat in spight."

Once more the bridesmaids were supposed to look after the bride's pecuniary interests. Thus, at the church porch, when the bridegroom produced the ring and other articles relating to his marriage, the chief bridesmaid took charge of the "dow purse," which was publicly given to the bride as an instalment of her pin-money. Horace Walpole, writing to Miss Berry, in the year 1791, speaks of the dow purse as a thing of the past, and writes as follows:

"Our wedding is over very properly, though with little ceremony, and nothing of ancient fashion but two bridesmaids. The endowing purse, I believe, has been left off since broad pieces were called in and melted down."

It has been pointed out, however, that a survival of this usage is preserved in Cumberland. The bridegroom provides himself with gold and crown pieces, and when the service reaches the point, "with all my worldly goods I thee endow," he takes the money, hands the clergyman his fee, and pours the rest into a handkerchief which the bridesmaid holds for the bride.

In Scotland the bridesmaid is popularly known as the "best maid," and one of her principal duties was to convey the bride's presents on the wedding to her future home. The first article generally taken into the house was a vessel of salt a portion of which was sprinkled over the floor, as a protection against the "evil eye." She also attended the bride when she called on her friends, and gave a personal invitation to her wedding.—T. F. Thiselton Dyer, in Cassell's Family Magazine.

THE ESPINOSILLA.

A Plant That Is of Great Value to the Mexicans.

The espinosilla, or thorn plant, says Marchial Oropeza, a well-known Mexican naturalist, is native to Mexico, and abounds in various parts of the republics, principally near this capital, at San Angel, Texcoco, Santa Fe, etc. It is one of those beautiful wild plants which adorn the plains of Mexico, and is found particularly in cold, dry spots. It has been thus christened because on touching it a sensation is felt similar to that which a plant covered with thorns would produce.

The Aztecs lacking soap—so necessary to their health and happiness—found its substitute in the espinosilla. They agitated a bough in water and it produced a lather, with which they washed using the plant as a scrub-brush. Even to day it is used by women as a hair preservative, having extraordinary powers in that direction. But its most useful application is as a medicinal agent to fight fevers, as it is an excellent diaphoretic.

Its ancient name is beautiful. Hoitzitzilxochitl, a compound word: Holtzitzil — humming bird and xochitl flower; thus translated meaning "flower of the humming bird."

The Spaniards called it Huitzilchile, signifying sparrow—a name given to on account of the resemblance between the color of the flower and that of a sparrow's head plumes.

Those who know the Aztec tongue assert that its real name is cuachile.

The espinosilla belongs to the polemoniaceas family, and the Hoitzia coccinea genus and species, cav.; loesel a coccinea, G. Don; cantua hoitzia, Willd; hoitzia Mexicana, Lauck; cantua, Poir.

It is a perennial plant of variable height but never more than three feet in height; of a pivotal root, rather flexible, of white surface corrugated, from which spring secondary roots, thin and separated.

In general the plant is rough and thorny, more so as its age increases. The taste is bitter, especially of the leaves, but the root has two tastes, when first tasted being sweet, after which it is bitter.

There are other varieties in the Republic—the lesalia gladulosa, growing in the hot lands; tecoma supertus, in Oaxaca; the L. clatum, in Vera Cruz; the L. involucrata, in Acapulco, and the L. amplectens, between San Blas and Tepic.—The Two Republics.

MR. AND MRS. BOWSER.

In Which His Mannish Ways in Regard to New Garments Are Set Forth.

Mr. Bowser has been that way ever since we were married, and I suppose he will keep it up to the end—just like all other husbands. When he brings home half a dozen collars I know that a circus is about to begin, and I prepare accordingly. After supper he goes upstairs to try them on, and I take a seat on the lower step, knowing full well the part I am to play. For a couple of minutes all is quiet. Then I hear the mutter of distant thunder, followed by an exclamation of:

"By the great horn spoon, but if I had that man here I'd murder him!"

About sixty seconds later his head appears over the banister and he shouts:

"Mrs. Bowser, come up here!"

"What's wanted?"

"Come up here! Look at those collars, will you?"

"What's the matter?"

"Matter! That infernal shirt maker ought to be scalped! I told him No. 15, and he has made them all No. 20!"

"Nonsense! Here's the stamp on them, and they are all right. Try one on."

He buttons one on and they fit splendidly. Indeed, he never had such a fit. He looks in the glass, however, grows red in the face, and shouts:

"Look at it! I'll kill that man before noon to-morrow! He has done it to spite me!"

"Mr. Bowser, that collar is all right. You never had one that set"——

"Right! Right! Look at it hunch up in the back! See how it sets in front! Observe how it is sawing away at my ears! You want me to look like a baboon, don't you? I'll walk in on that shirt maker after breakfast to-morrow morning, and if I don't slam the buttons off'n him then I'm a liar!"

"But I can't see anything wrong with them."

"No, of course not! If they made me look like a baked owl you couldn't see anything out of the way! Mrs. Bowser, I've got to have a long talk with you. There are some things which must be settled!"

And next morning he puts on one of the collars without a word and there is never any further fault finding. They were a fit and all right, but he wouldn't be an average husband if he didn't growl and kick. It is when his new shirts come up that the whole menagerie is put on exhibition free gratis. They invariably come up of a Saturday night, and he wants to put one on for Sunday wear. I know what is coming, and I take baby over to mother's and give the cook liberty to go out for the day. I am hardly ready for him when the magazine explodes.

"Mrs. Bowser!" he shouts over the banister.

"Well?"

"Did Lynch bring home my shotgun last night?"

"What do you want of a shotgun?"

"To kill the infernal idiot who made these shirts! I'd have his life before the sun sets to-night! I'll murder him right before his wife and children!"

"Why, Mr. Bowser! What's the matter with the shirts?"

"Matter?" he yells as he jumps up and down, holding one of the lot at arm's length, "everything's the matter! My band is fifteen inches scant, and he has made these 4,000 rods long! Look at that bosom! Look at that yoke! I'll follow that man to the end of the earth but what I'll have his blood!"

"Why, they look all right to me. The band is stiff with starch, you know."

"I'll stiffen that idiot with something besides starch! People impose on me because I never kick, but the worm has turned at last. I suppose I'll be sent to state prison for life, but that shan't stand in the way of my revenge."

"Put on another and I'll come up and see what the trouble is."

Ten minutes later he calls and I go up to find him red in the face and breathing hard. I button the shirt in the back, pull it down and it fits him like a glove, but all of a sudden he gives a jump, waves his hand after the manner of Booth and exclaims:

"Yes! I'll hunt him down and crush the life out of him."

"Mr. Bowser, there's nothing wrong with the shirt. You never had one to fit you better."

"Nothing wrong! Why, it feels as if I had put on an old coffee sack. Look at the way it bunches up in the neck. See how it binds on the shoulders. I wouldn't be found dead with this shirt on."

"Well, as I said before, I can't see anything wrong with it."

"Oh, you can't! Anything is good enough for me, I suppose. If some fool sent me up a sheet iron shirt you'd think it was all right. You can go downstairs."

"But aren't we going to church?"

"Church! Don't say church to me! I'm going out and commit murder."

About dinner time he feels easier, and after supper his indignation has all passed away. Next morning he puts on one of his shirts, and it isn't a week before he is bragging of the perfect fit.—Detroit Free Press.

Only a Brief Stay.

He was one of those dry old jokers, and as he settled his portly frame into a Murray rotunda rocker for his after dinner smoke a dashing, fashionably dressed young man rushed up, held out his hand and exclaimed:

"Well, I declare, judge, when did you get in?"

"Oh, t'other day; when did you come?" returned the "judge."

"Last night, over the Burlington."

"How long are you going to stay?"

"As long as my money holds out," chuckeled the young man.

"Sorry you're going to leave so soon," observed the judge, without cracking a smile.—Omaha Republican.

THE COMMITTEE MET.

And Two Members of It Settled Every Thing to Their Own Satisfaction.

"If I mistake not, Laura," said the young man, as he drummed absent-mindedly on the drawing-room table with his fingers, "you are one of the committee to select headquarters for our club."

"Yes, I am one of the committee."

"I am another, and Prof. McGoozle is the third. There is a house down on Chuggle avenue that I think will suit us exactly, but if we get it we'll have to go and make the arrangement this afternoon, for there are other persons after it. I suggested to the Professor," continued the young man, with some confusion in his manner and a bright magenta flush careering madly over his face, "that we should meet at that house this afternoon. It is only a few blocks away. Can you go now as well as at any other time?"

"I can."

A few minutes later George Ferguson and Laura Kajones, members of the Keewaygooster Literary Club, were on their way to Chuggle avenue, the young man nervously consulting his watch at frequent intervals, as if he were somehow afraid they would not meet the Professor unless they hurried.

But George Ferguson wasn't afraid of any such thing. The reader need feel no hesitation in accepting this statement as true. The narrator of the facts has investigated the whole business and knows what he is talking about. George was not laboring under any serious apprehension lest he should fail to meet Prof. McGoozle.

"This is the—the house," he said, as he stopped in front of a modern structure, built in a style combining the Gothic and serio comic orders of architecture in a wonderful manner, with large, aggressive bay-window and ornate cobblestone front.

"This!" exclaimed the young woman. "Why, this looks like a——"

"It's all right—it's all right!" protested George. "We'll go in. The Professor is waiting—that is, he may be waiting for us."

They went to the door and rang the bell.

A dark and discreet person of middle age admitted them.

"We have come to see the house, Mrs. Olekentuck," said the young man.

"For the land's sake, Mr. Ferguson," replied the dark person, in surprise, "what's tuh hinder yuh f'm lookin' at ——"

"As I said," hastily interposed George, "we have come to look at the house. This, Miss Laura," he continued, opening the sliding doors on the right of the hall, "is the front parlor. Here is the——"

"But——"

"And this is the back parlor. Here on the left is the library, and——"

"I don't under——"

"Here, you see, is a spacious dining-room, and just beyond——"

"But where is Prof. McGoozle?"

"Never mind Prof. McGoozle, we're a majority of this committee. Let me call your attention, Laura, to this next room. It is the coziest little boudoir that you ever—just sit down on that divan. Isn't it luxurious?"

"Haven't you made a mistake, George? The Keewaygooster Club surely does not need——"

"Never mind the need of the Keewaygooster Club, Laura."

He sat down by her side, and went on:

"When I pick out a building I want it complete. Do you see any thing wrong with this?"

"O, no. It is perfectly elegant. It is furnished in lovely style, but it seems to me too large and fine for a club headquarters."

"Why, Laura, you haven't seen the half of it yet. There's the kitchen, and the laundry, and——" here he consulted his watch, "but we can look at all these later. Do you see any thing wrong with this place for a—for a—headquarters, you know—a home for the—for the Keewaygooster Club, or any thing of that kind?"

"How strangely you talk, George!"

"Building and furniture all O. K., aren't they?"

"Perfectly splendid, but——"

"Don't see any thing lacking?"

"Surely not. But, tell me, whose lovely house is it, and how does it happen to be for rent?"

"See the wide lawn in front? Observe the spacious backyard, and those neat stables and carriage-house? Notice anything lacking, Laura?"

"O, no!"

"Well, I do!" exclaimed George, with great positiveness. "It needs—a—er—didn't you ask me a minute ago whose it is, Laura?"

"Yes."

"It belongs to—you're sure you like it? We're a majority of the committee, you know. You don't find any fault with it, Laura?"

"No, no."

"Well, it belongs to George Ferguson, Esq. He bought it and fitted it up without telling anybody. And it needs——"

"Don't, George!"

"It needs—or George needs—a darling little woman to be——"

"Don't George!"

"To take it off his hands. Will you have it, Laura, with the Ferguson incumbrances thrown in?"

"O, George!"

* * * * *

"George, dear, what will Prof. McGoozle say?"

* * * * *

"Professor," remarked George severely, "you are one hour late. It is now four o'clock. We have been here since three."

"Four o'clock, Mr. Ferguson," replied Prof. McGoozle, with equal severity, was the exact hour at which you suggested we should meet."

"The house, I—or—regret to say, Professor," rejoined the young man, loftily ignoring the discrepancy in the statements concerning the hour appointed for the meeting, "is not exactly suitable for the headquarters of the Keewaygooster Literary Club. A majority of the committee, Professor, have met and so decided, and the meeting has adjourned. The house will be occupied from and after the first day of next May by—shall I tell the Professor, Laura?"

"If you wish."

"By a majority of the committee, Professor."—Chicago Tribune.

A PETERTOWN QUARREL.

It Was Fierce While It Lasted, But Was Made Up With a Kiss.

Miss Susie Tansy—Very well, Mr. Hank Stoner, if you want to devote yourself to Becky Weeden you are at perfect liberty to do so.

Mr. Hank Stoner—Lord, Susie, what in creation do you mean?

"Oh, you're mighty innocent, ain't you?"

"What have I done?"

"I'd ask if I were you, Hank Stoner."

"Pshaw, Suze, what's the use of your getting so jealous?"

"Jealous? Whose getting jealous, I'd like to know?"

"You are."

"I?"

"Yes, you."

"Don't flatter yourself, sir. When I get jealous it'll be for something worth getting jealous of. I'll let you know that."

"Well, what you want to kick up all this fuss for because I paid Becky Weeden a little attention at the party to-night?"

"A little attention! I'd say a little if I were you! Tagging at her heels ev'ry step she took!"

"Now, Susie."

"It's so, Hank Stoner. I saw you giving her peppermint drops."

"Well, didn't I give you some, too?"

"Well, you chose her three times hand runnin' in the kissin' games, and you played post-office and dug a well, and picked grapes with her, so you did."

"Well, what of it?"

"What of it? There's jist this of it: No fellow can take me to a party and leave me to set around sucking my thumbs while he's flirting around with all the other girls in the room!"

"Pshaw, Suze. I played with you as much as I did with any body."

"Yes, you did."

"Well, I did."

"You didn't! I saw you kiss Janey Plumm four times in the 'Marching Down to Old Quebec' game."

"Well, great Scott, Suze! I'll kiss you forty times now, if you so so!"

"Smarty!"

"I will—see if I don't."

"Well, you just won't. If you can't treat me as a gentleman should treat a lady when he takes her to a party, you can just take back your old ring and our engagement can end here."

"Now, Susie."

"I mean it, sir!"

"No, you don't."

"I do, sir."

"Oh, you're just gassing."

"You'll find out if you don't walk pretty straight."

"Lord, Suze, you know you wouldn't throw me over for any thing in the world."

"Oh, wouldn't I? Mighty good opinion you have of yourself.

"But I'll—"

"Oh, let's kiss and make up, Suze!"

"I won't, Hank Stoner, until you—let me be!"

"Hee, hee, hee, Suze!"

"It ain't any laughing matter with—stop that!"

"Stop what?"

"You know what, and—quit, I say!"

"N-o-o-w, Suze."

"Don't you dare kiss me again, or I'll—Hank Stoner!"

"Well."

"Behave yourself."

"Hee, hee, hee!"

"If I don't—Hank!"

"Now, Susie!"

"I don't care, Hank; I do think you treated me real shabby, so you did, and if you ever do so again, I'll get mad and I'll stay mad, and now see if I don't."—Time.

THE FAITHFUL ELEPHANT.

One Who Would Not Stir Until He Heard His Master's Voice.

In some countries in Asia an elephant is made to carry the flag in battles. This is because the elephant is so tall, and the soldiers can easily see the flag flying from his back. One of these elephants, which belonged to the Poona host, was very brave and very kind, but he would obey the order of no one except his mahout, or driver. One time, while a very fierce fight was raging, the driver called out to him; "Stand, my brave beast, stand!" A moment later the mahout received a fatal wound and fell to the ground, where he lay beneath a pile of wounded and slain. The obedient animal would not move, though the battle raged fiercely around him. The Poona soldiers, who feared they were being overcome, were cheered on by the sight of the flag still floating from his back. He never stirred a foot, and all through the hot fight, the noise, the smoke, the confusion, listened patiently for the voice of his master.

Sharp spears were hurled at him, a score of javelins pierced his sides, his long ears dripped with blood, but he stood like a rock.

"Come forward, my men!" cried the Poona Captain; "our flag still floats and the battle will yet be ours."

His men, discouraged and ready to fly, rallied at his command, and with a cheer for the flag pressed forward. In a short time they had won the victory and put the enemy to flight. And then they gathered around the brave elephant, offering to lead him where he could be fed and cared for. But, though wounded and worn, the obedient creature would not move until he heard his master's voice. That master could never speak again. A rider was sent in great haste to a place fifty miles away, where lived the driver's little son, whom the elephant knew and loved. When the little boy was brought to the battle-ground the elephant showed very plainly that he was glad to see him, and permitted the child to lead him away.—Our Little Ones.

Facts About Shaving.

A close shave means the removal of a layer of skin all around. The blood vessels thus exposed are not visible to the eye, but under the microscope each little quivering mouth holding a minute blood drop protests against such treatment. The nerve tips are also uncovered and the pores are left unprotected, which makes the skin tender and unhealthy. The sudden exposure of the inner layer of the skin renders a person liable to have colds, hoarseness and sore throat.—Medical Classics.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 7 1890

BORN.

FIEHMAN—At Keeler, February 1, 1890, to Mr. and Mr. John Fiehman, a son.

LACEY—At Camp Independence, January 25, 1890, to Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Lacey a daughter.

Dr. Bunting was up from Lone Pine at the beginning of t e week.

Mr. M. C. Hall and Miss Alice Meade were married at Bishop on Wednesday.

The INDEPENDENT has been declared the county official paper and all legal notices will be found in its columns.

When Supervisor Harger was telegraphed for there were but two members of the Board present and a third was needed to make a quorum.

H. H. Spears went through Independence last Saturday with a ten horse team bound for Mojave. Most of his return cargo will be for Bishop.

Mr. J. D. Marshall of Keeler has contracted with Conn & Trudo to put a big team hauling borax from their works in Saline Valley to Alvord. Mr. Marshall is now moving his family from Keeler to Big Pine.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m., at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening; Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

Land Contest.

The officers at the Land Office were engaged during the week in taking testimony in a contested location. George Rinehackel contests an entry of a homestead made by John Johnson at Fish Springs. Johnson never made any improvement upon the place and the time for proving up has passed. In addition to that Johnson died about six months ago and left no relatives, so Rinehackel has no one to oppose him in the contest.

Borax.

M. Bush came in from Saline Valley last Monday. He brought along samples of borate of lime from his borax location. This is the richest form in which borax is found and Mr. Bush has one location of 160 acres that carries that kind of material. John Stoutenborough of Bishop and John F. Millner of Benton were at Saline last week and they, together with Mr. Lent, made some locations of borax land. It is understood that Mr. Cox, a Boston man, is an equal partner with the three named before. These parties propose to go over the Valley soon with a large outfit for a borax camp. Mr. Bush says Conn & Trudo have a large quantity of borax at their camp all ready for shipment but there is scarcity of teams. The weather continues very pleasant in Saline.

Masonic Installation.

A very pleasant occasion was enjoyed at Independence last Wednesday evening, the affair being the installation of the officers of the Masonic Lodge. The installing officer was the retiring Worshipful Master of the Lodge, Brother John W. P. Laird, and he conducted the services in a very pleasing manner. The installation was public and was attended by the families and friends of the members of the Lodge. The following were installed: P. H. Mack, W. M.; J. S. Gorman, S. W.; T. C. Boland, J. W.; O. I. Mairs; Treas.; C. Mulholland, Sec.; G. W. Brady, S. D.; J. V. Skinner, J. D.; J. J. Moore, J. D. Mairs, Stewards; Thos. Parker, Tyler. After the installation the company went to Mair's Hall and engaged in dancing. A fine supper was served at the Norman House and the company separated with expressions of pleasure.

A Good Prospect.

The prospect is good for a considerable revival of business at Darwin as Spring Opens. It is said on what appears to be good authority that Hon. P. Reddy has bought the waterworks and will make a good deal of improvement thereon. Mr. Reddy has already put up two jiggers and these are now being worked on ore from the Defiance. Each machine will work from four to five tons of ore per day. An immense amount of ore is on the dump and more machines will be added. Mr. J. A. McKenzie continues shipping ore from the Lucky Jim. Mr. J. C. Eddy recently put some men to work in the Promontory and will increase the force there and in other mines as soon as Spring opens. Mr. C. Anthony has again got the road open up through Sherherd's Canyon to the Riley mill and has teams hauling wood. He will be ready in a few days to start up the mill again and a good deal of work will be done there. A few more men have recently been put to work in the Defiance mine and more would be employed but there are no idle miners at Darwin. Altogether the prospects for that camp are very good.

Dam god Canals.

The headgate of the Eastside canal was found in place when the flood in Owens river subsided. The banks of the canal at and above the headgate are badly cut away by the flood and Mr. McIver says it will be a difficult and expensive job to repair the damage. The expense would have been vastly greater if the gate had gone, with the further probability of not being able to get in another gate before next fall. The framing of the gate was made in a very thorough manner and this alone prevented much greater damage. On the Stevens ditch a great deal of damage was done. Unfortunately the canal runs for a long distance along the edge of a steep bank where breaks frequently occur and have so far been a constant source of expense. Last year the bank gave way at a critical time and crops were lost in consequence of want of water. In the event of floods the liability to damage is greatly increased. A camp is now located east of Independence and a company of men are there with animals and machines repairing the broken banks.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

"Old Sir James laughed, and said that shoot him they might, but that he consigned his soul to the devil if he would enrich them with his treasures, and then asked that his Bible might be brought to him that he might read therein and prepare himself for death.

"They gave him the Bible and left him. Next morning at the dawn a file of Roundheads marched him out into the court yard of the castle, and here he found Col. Playfair and his officers waiting.

"'Now, Sir James, for your last word. Will you reveal where the treasure lies, or will you choose to die?'

"'I will not reveal,' answered the old man. 'Murder me if you will. The act is worthy of holy Presbyters. I have spoken and my mind is fixed.'

"'Bethink you,' said the colonel.

"'I have thought,' he answered, 'and I am ready. Slay me and seek the treasure. But one thing I ask. My young son is not here. In France hath he been this three years, and naught knows he of where I have hid this gold. Send to him this Bible when I am dead. Nay, search it from page to page. There is naught therein save what I have writ here upon this last sheet. It is all I have left to give.'

"'The book shall be searched,' answered the colonel, 'and if naught is found therein it shall be sent. And now, in the name of God, I adjure you, Sir James, let not the love of lucre stand between you and your life. Here I make you one last offer. Discover but to us the £10,000 whereof you speak in this writing'—and he held up the letter to the king—'and you shall go free—refuse and you die.'

"'I refuse,' he answered.

"'Musquetteers make ready,' shouted the colonel, and the file of men stepped forward.

"But at that moment there came up so furious a squall of wind, together with dense and cutting rain, that for awhile the execution was delayed. Presently it passed, and the wild light of the November morning swept out from the sky, and revealed the doomed man kneeling upon the sodden turf, with the water running from his white hair and beard, and praying.

They called to him to stand up, but he would not, and continued praying. So they shot him on his knees."

"Well," said Col. Quaritch, "at any rate he died like a gallant gentleman."

At that moment there was a knock at the door, and the servant came in.

"What is it?" asked the squire.

"George is here, please, sir," said the girl, "and says that he would like to see you."

"Confound him!" growled the old gentleman; "he is always here after something or other. I suppose it is about the Moat farm. He was going to see Janter today. Will you excuse me, Quaritch? My daughter will tell you the end of the story if you care to hear any more. I will join you in the drawing room."

CHAPTER IV.

THE END OF THE TALE.

As soon as her father had gone Ida rose and suggested that if Col. Quaritch had done his wine they should go into the drawing room, which they accordingly did. This room was much more modern than either the vestibule or the dining room, and had a general air and flavor of the Nineteenth century young lady about it. There were the little tables, the draperies, the photograph frames, and all the hundred and one knick-knacks and odds and ends by means of which a lady of taste makes a room lovely in the eyes of brutal man. It was a very pleasant place to look upon, this drawing room at Honham castle, with its irregular recesses, its somewhat faded colors illuminated by the soft light of a shaded lamp, and its genuine air of feminine dominion. Harold Quaritch was a man who had seen much of the world, but had not seen much of drawing rooms, or, indeed, of ladies at large. These had not come in his way, or if they had come in his way he had avoided them. Therefore, perhaps, was he the more susceptible to such influences when he came in contact with them. Or perhaps it was the presence of Ida's gracious self which threw a charm about the place that added to its natural attractiveness, as the china bowls of lavender and rose leaves added perfume to the air. Anyhow, it struck him that he had never seen a room which conveyed to his mind such an idea of gentle rest and refinement.

"What a charming room," he said, as he entered it.

"I am glad you think so," answered Ida; "because it is my own territory, and I arranged it."

"Yes," he said, "it is easy to see that."

"Well, would you like to hear the end of the story about Sir James and his treasure?"

"Certainly, it interests me very much."

"It positively fascinates me," said Ida, with emphasis. "Listen, and I will tell you. After they had shot old Sir James they took the Bible off him, but whether or no Col. Playfair ever sent it to the son in France is not known.

"The story is all known historically, and it is known that, as my father said, he asked that his Bible might be sent, but nothing more. This son, Sir Edward, never lived to return to England. After his father's murder the estates were seized by the Parliamentary party, and the old castle, with the exception of the gate towers, razed to the ground, partly for military purposes and partly in the long and determined attempt that was made to discover old Sir James' treasure, which might, it was thought, have been concealed in some secret chamber in the walls. But it was all of no use, and Col. Playfair found that in letting his temper get the better of him and shooting Sir James, he had done away with the only chance of finding the money that he was ever likely to have, for to all appearance the secret had died with its owner. There was a great noise about it at the time, and the colonel was degraded from his rank in reward for what he he had done. Is was presumed that old Sir James must have had accomplices in the hiding of so great a mass of gold, and every means, by way of threats and promises of reward—which at last grew to half of the total amount that should be discovered—was taken to induce these to come forward if they existed, but without result. And so the matter went on, till after a few years the whole thing died away and was forgotten.

"Meanwhile the son, Sir Edward, who was the second and last baronet, led a wandering life abroad, fearing or not caring to return to England, now that all his property had been seized. When he was two-and twenty years of age, however, he contracted an imprudent marriage with his cousin, a lady of the name of Ida Dofferleigh, a girl of good blood and great beauty, but without means. Indeed, she was the sister of George Dofferleigh, who was a cousin and companion in exile of Sir Edward's, and, as you will presently see, my lineal ancestor. Well, within a year of this marriage poor Ida, my namesake, died, with her baby, of fever, chiefly brought on, they say, by want and anxiety of mind, and the shock seems to have turned her husband's brain. At any rate, within three or four months of her death he committed suicide. But before he did so he formally executed a rather elaborate will, by which he left all his estates in England, now unjustly withheld from me, contrary to law and natural right, by the rebel pretender Cromwell, together with the treasure hidden thereon or elsewhere by my late murdered father, Sir James de la Molle,' to John Geoffrey Dofferleigh, his cousin, and the brother of his late wife and his heir forever, on condition only of his assuming the name and arms of the De la Molle family, the direct line of which became extinct with himself. Well, of course, this will, when executed, was to all appearances so much waste paper, but within three years from its execution Charles II was king of England.

"Thereon John Dofferleigh produced the document, and on assuming the name and arms of De la Molle actually succeeded in obtaining the remains of the castle and a considerable portion of the landed property, though the baronetcy became extinct. His son it was who built this present house, and he is our direct ancestor, for though my father talks of them as though they were—it is a little weakness of his—the old De la Molles were not our direct male ancestors."

"Well," said Harold, "and did Dofferleigh find the treasure?"

"No, ah, no, nor anybody else. The treasure has vanished. He hunted for it a great deal, and he did find those pieces of plate which you saw to-night, hidden away somewhere, I don't know where, but there was nothing else with them."

"Perhaps the whole thing was nonsense," said Harold, reflectively.

"No," said Ida, shaking her head, "I am sure it was not. I am sure the treasure is hidden away somewhere to this day. Listen, Col. Quaritch—you have not heard quite all the story yet—I found something."

"You what?"

"Wait a minute and I will show you," and going to a cabinet in the corner she unlocked it, and took out a dispatch box, which she also unlocked.

"Here," she said, "I found this. It is the Bible that Sir James begged might be sent to his son, just before they shot him, you remember," and she handed him a small brown book. He took it and examined it carefully. It was bound in leather, and on the cover was written in large letters, "Sir James de la Molle. Honham Castle, 1611." Nor was this all. The first sheets of the Bible, which was one of the earliest copies of the authorized version, were torn out, and the top corner was also gone, having to all appearance been shot off by a bullet, a presumption that a dark stain of blood upon the cover and edges brought near to certainty.

"Poor fellow," said Harold, "he must have had it in his pocket when he was shot. Where did you find it?"

"Yes, I suppose so," said Ida; "in fact I have no doubt of it. I found it when I was a child in an old oak chest in the basement of the western tower, quite hidden up in dust and rubbish and bits of old iron. But look at the end and you will see what he wrote in it to his son Edward. Here I will show you," and leaning over him she turned to the last page of the book. Between the bottom of the page and the conclusion of the final chapter of Revelation there had been a small blank space now densely covered with crabbed writing in faded ink, which she read aloud. It ran as follows:

"Do not grieve for me, Edward, my son, that I am thus suddenly done to death by rebel murderers, for naught happeneth but according to God's will. And now farewell, Edward, till we shall meet in heaven. My moneys have I hid, and on account thereof I die unto this world, knowing that not one piece shall Cromwell touch. To whom God shall appoint, shall all my treasure be, for naught can I communicate."

"There," said Ida, triumphantly. "What do you think of that, Col. Quaritch? The Bible, I think, was never sent to his son, but here it is, and in that writing, as I solemnly believe," and she laid her white fingers upon the faded characters, "lies the key to wherever it is that the money is hidden, only I fear that I shall never make it out. For years I have puzzled over it, thinking that it might be some form of acrostic, but I can make nothing of it. I have tried it all ways. I have translated it into French, and had it translated into Latin, but still I can find out nothing—nothing. But some day somebody will hit upon it—at least I hope so."

Harold shook his head. "I am afraid," he said, "that what has remained undiscovered for so long will remain so till the end of the chapter. Perhaps the old Sir James was hoaxing his adversaries!"

"No," said Ida, "for if he was, what became of all the money? He was known to be one of the richest men of his day, and that he was rich, one can see from his letter to the king. There was nothing after his death, except his lands, of course. Oh, it will be found some day, twenty centuries hence probably, much too late to be of any good to us," and she sighed deeply, while a pained and wearied expression spread itself over her handsome face.

"Well," said Harold, in a doubtful voice, "there may be something in it. May I take a copy of that writing."

"Certainly," said Ida, laughing, "and if you find the treasure we will go shares. Stop, I will dictate it to you."

Just as this process was finished and Harold was shutting up his pocketbook, in which he put the fair copy he had executed on a half sheet of note paper, the old squire came into the room again. Looking at his face, his visitor saw that his interview with "George" had evidently been anything but satisfactory, for it bore an expression of exceedingly low spirits.

"Well, father, what is the matter?" asked his daughter.

"Oh, nothing, my dear, nothing," he answered, in melancholy tones. "George has been here, that is all."

"Yes, and I wish he would keep away," she said, with a little stamp of her foot, "for he has always some bad news or other."

"It is the times, my dear, it is the times, it isn't George. I really don't know what has come to the country."

"What is it?" said Ida, with a deepening expression of anxiety. "Something wrong about the Moat farm?"

"Yes; Janter has thrown it up, after all, and I am sure I don't know where I am to find another tenant."

"You see what the pleasures of landed property are, Col. Quaritch," said Ida, turning toward him with a smile which did not somehow convey a great sense of cheerfulness.

"Yes," he said, "I know. Thank goodness I have only the ten acres that my dear old aunt left me. And now," he added, "I think that I must be saying good night. It is 10:30, and I expect that old Mrs. Jobson is sitting up for me."

Ida looked up in remonstrance, and opened her lips to speak, and then from some reason that did not appear changed her mind and held out her hand. "Good night, Col. Quaritch," she said. "I am so pleased that we are going to have you as a neighbor. By the way, I have a few people coming to play lawn tennis here to-morrow afternoon. Will you come too?"

"What!" broke in the squire, in a voice of irritation; "more lawn tennis parties, Ida? I think that you might have spared me for once—with all this business on my hands, too."

"Nonsense, father," said his daughter, with some acerbity. "How can a few people playing lawn tennis hurt you? It is quite useless to shut one's self up and be miserable over things that one can't help."

The old gentleman collapsed with an air of pious resignation, and meekly asked who was coming.

"Oh, nobody in particular. Mr. and Mrs. Jeffries—Mr. Jeffries is our clergyman, you know, Col. Quaritch—and Dr. Bass and the two Miss Smiths, one of whom he is supposed to be in love with, and Mr. and Mrs. Quest, and Mr. Edward Cossey, and a few more."

"Mr. Edward Cossey!" said the squire, jumping off his chair; "really, Ida, you know that I detest that young man, that I consider him an abominable young man, and I think that you might have shown more consideration to me than to have asked him here."

"I could not help it, father," she answered, coolly. "He was with Mrs. Quest when I asked her, so I had to ask him, too. Besides, I rather like Mr. Cossey, he is always so polite, and I don't see why you should take such a violent prejudice against him. Anyhow, he is coming, and there is an end of it."

"Cossey, Cossey," said Harold, throwing himself into the Breach, "I used to know that name." It seemed to Ida that he winced a little as he said it. "Is he one of the great banking family?"

"Yes," said Ida, "he is one of the sons. They say he will have half a million of money, or more, when his father, who is very infirm, dies. He is looking after the branch bank of his house in this part of the world, at least, nominally. Really, I fancy that Mr. Quest manages them, certainly he manages the Boisingham branch."

"Well, well," said the squire, "if they are coming, I suppose they are coming. At any rate, I can go out walking. If you are going home, Quaritch, I will walk with you. I want a little air."

"Col. Quaritch, you have not said if you will come to my party to-morrow yet," said Ida, as he stretched out his hand to say good-by.

"Oh, thank you, Miss De la Molle; yes, I think I can come, though I play tennis atrociously."

"Oh, we all do that. Well, good night. I am so very pleased that you have come to live at Molehill, it will be so nice for my father to have a companion," she added as an afterthought.

"Yes," said the colonel, grimly, "we are almost of an age, good night."

Ida watched the door close, and then

Ida watched the door close.

leaned her arm on the mantelpiece, and reflected that she liked Col. Quaritch very much, so much that even his not very beautiful physiognomy did not repel her, indeed, rather attracted her than otherwise. "Do you know," she said to herself, "I think that that is the sort of man that I should like to marry. Nonsense," she added, with an impatient shrug, "nonsense, you are nearly six-and-twenty; altogether too old for that sort of thing. And now there is this new trouble about the Moat farm. My poor old dad. Well, it is a hard world, and I think that sleep is about the best thing in it." And, with a sigh, she lighted her candle to go to bed, then changed her mind, and sat down to await her father's return.

CHAPTER V.

THE SQUIRE EXPLAINS THE POSITION.

"I don't know what is coming to this country, I really don't, and that's a fact," said the squire to his companion, after they had walked some paces in silence. "Here is this farm, the Moat farm. It fetched twenty-five shillings an acre when I was a young man, and eight years ago it used to fetch thirty-five. Now I have reduced it, and reduced it, to fifteen, just in order to keep the tenant. And what is the end of it? Janter—he's the tenant—gave notice last Michaelmas, but that stupid owl, George, said it was all nothing, and that he would continue at fifteen shillings when the time came. And now to-night he comes to me with a face as long as a yard arm, and says that Janter won't keep it at any price, and that he does not know where he is to find another tenant, not he. It's quite heart breaking, that's what it is. Three hundred acres of good, sound, food producing land, and no tenant for it at fifteen shillings an acre. What am I to do?"

"Can't you take it in hand and farm it yourself?" asked Harold.

"How can I take it in hand? I have one farm of a hundred and fifty acres in hand as it is. Do you know what it would cost to take over that farm?" and he stopped in his walk and stuck his stick into the ground. "Ten pounds an acre, every farthing of it—and say a thousand for the covenants—about four thousand pounds in all. Now where am I to get four thousand pounds to speculate with in that way, for it is a speculation, and one which I am too old to look after myself, even if I had the knowledge? Well, there you are, and now I'll say good night, sir. It's getting chilly, and I have felt my chest for the last year or two. Try the way, I suppose I shall see you to-morrow at this tennis party of Ida's. It's all very well for Ida to go in for her tennis parties, but how can I think of such things with all this worry on my hands? Well, good night, Col. Quaritch, good night," and he turned and walked away through the moonlight.

Harold Quaritch watched him go and then started off home.

He entered the house, and having told Mrs. Jobson that she could go to bed, sat down to smoke and think. Harold Quaritch was, like many solitary men, a great smoker, and never did he feel the need of the consolation of tobacco more than he did this night. A few months ago, when he had retired from the army, he found himself in a great dilemma. There he was, a hale, active man of three and forty, of busy habits and regular mind, suddenly thrown upon the world without occupation. What was he to do with himself? While he was asking himself this question and waiting blankly for an answer which did not come, his aunt, old Mrs. Massey, departed this life, leaving him heir to what she possessed—it might be three hundred a year in all. This, added to his pension and the little that he owned independently, put him beyond the necessity of seeking further employment. So he had made up his mind to come to reside at Molehill, and live the quiet, somewhat aimless life of a small country gentleman. His reading—for he was a great reader, especially of scientific works—would, he thought, keep him employed, seeing that in addition to reading he was a thorough sportsman, and an ardent, though owing to the smallness of his means, necessarily not a very extensive, collector of curiosities, and more particularly of coins.

At first, after he had come to his decision, a feeling of infinite rest and satisfaction had taken possession of him. The struggle of life was over for him. No longer would he be obliged to think, and contrive, and toil henceforth his days would slope gently down toward the inevitable end. Trouble lay in the past, now rest and rest alone awaited him, rest that would gradually grow deeper and deeper as the swift years rolled by, till it was swallowed up in that almighty peace to which, being a simple and religious man, he had looked forward from childhood as the end and object of his life.

Foolish man and vain imagining! Here, while we draw breath, there is no rest. We must go on continually, on from strength to strength, or weakness to weakness, we must always be troubled about this or that, and must ever have this to desire or that to regret. It is an inevitable law within whose attraction all must fall, yes, even the purest souls, cradled in their hope of heaven, and the most swinish, wallowing in the mud of their gratified desires.

READ A FEW LINES OF GOOD ADVICE—IT MAY SAVE YOUR LIFE.

I am broken down and discouraged, and don't know just what to do for my health. This remark we often hear from both men and women that are positively in that condition that life is no longer to them a pleasure but instead a continual bore. THE GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE is especially adapted for just such cases. It acts gently on the bowels, purifies the blood without unsightly blotches, removes the kidneys and liver, the great organs of existence that must be kept clear. By thus doing its work it brings the nervous system into a healthy condition, producing sound and refreshing sleep. For all female complaints, leucorrhea, suppressed menses, no matter from what cause, attended by severe pain, and all other complaints so common among women, it immediately relieves and effects a permanent cure. Put aside all prejudice and give this most wonderful and best of all remedies a trial. Warranted purely vegetable. Delightful to the taste. For sale by all druggists. Take no other.

NO. 93.

What It Brought to Two Topeka People—A Fortune Wisely Invested.

On Tuesday, the 12th of November, the regular monthly drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery occurred and it brought luck to two persons in this city each of whom held one-twentieth of ticket bearing the No. "93," which drew the first capital prize of $300,000. A Democrat reporter took pains yesterday to ascertain what the fortunate holders of No. 93 had done with the money they got.]

Mrs. Margaret Villepique, who resides just outside the city limits, received her $15,000 in cash and deposited $5,000 in three different banks of the city, and entrusting the matter of its investment to a German friend, who is loaning it out at 8 per cent, interest on approved real estate security. The income will make Mrs. V. independent for life. Mr. and Mrs. Villepique came from Kansas City three years ago, where they had met with a heavy loss. They had considerable property, which was heavily mortgaged, and being unable to clear it off lost it by foreclosure. It is to-day worth $80,000. Arriving in Topeka, they bought five acres of land, paying $150 down on it, and by raising garden truck, which they sold in the city, supported the family, and had the debt nearly paid off when Mrs. V. drew the $15,000 on her ticket. It may be imagined that life looks much brighter to her than it did a month ago.

The other one-twentieth ticket was held by Dennis Northington, a colored man, engaged in delivering coal for the Green Coal company. He is a hard working, economical man and it had been his one ambition to some day be able to buy a Kansas farm and leave the city for a more peaceful life in the country. He little thought this ambition would be realized so quickly, but on November 13, the day after the drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery, he found himself the winner of a fortune—and a farm. He contemplates remaining a month longer with the Green Coal company and continue his teaming, and he is meantime on the look out for a good farm. He received his money ($15,000) through one of the national banks and has it safely deposited until he is ready to use it. He started in life a slave and the lottery has made him a rich as well as a free citizen of the Sunflower state.—Topeka (Kas) Democrat, December 9.

A new book of attractive reading, brimful of good things worth knowing and illustrated, is just issued. It contains a large collection of valuable autographs, excellent receipts for plain dishes, humor in rhyme and prose, monthly calendars, and can be had of all druggists and dealers, or, by sending a two-cent stamp to the publishers. An important feature of the work is its offer of Free Music, which offer is set forth therein, and by procuring the book, at once, any one can be supplied with a choice selection. The little volume is the St. Jacobs Oil Calendar for 1889-90, published by the Charles A. Vogeler Company, Baltimore, Md. It is fully the equal of any of its predecessors in the interest of the Great Remedy for Pain, St. Jacobs Oil, whose virtues never abate, and whose popularity never wanes. The demand for both book and medicine is very great.

THE GRAVE GETS TIRED YAWNING,

Seemingly, for certain wretched invalids who cuddle feebly along, though always looking as if they were going to die, but omitting to do it, they dry up, wither, dwindle away finally, but in the mean time never having robust health, know nothing of the physical enjoyment, the zest of that existence to which they cling with such remarkable tenacity. They are always to be found trying to mend by tinkering at themselves with some trashy remedy, tonic or "pick me up" to give a fillip to digestion, or "help the liver." If such misguided folks would resort and adhere to Hostetter's Stomach Bitters it would be well with them. This superb invigorant supplies the stamina that the feeble require, by permanently reinforcing digestion and assimilation. It overcomes nervousness, insomnia, malaria, kidney complaints, biliousness, constipation, rheumatism and neuralgia.

The girl with the rosebud mouth may have horns on her tongue.

When the summer's rose has faded
What shall make it fair again?
When the fire with pain is shaded
What shall drive away the pain?
Never shall a blossom brighten
After blighted by the frost,
But the load of pain may lighten
And we need not count as lost all the pleasure of life when the wife and mother, upon whom the happiness of home so largely depends, is afflicted with the delicate diseases peculiar to women. It is terrible to contemplate the misery existing in our midst because of the prevalence of these diseases. It is high time that all women should know that there is one sure remedy for all female complaints, and that is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Do not allow ill-health to fasten itself upon you. Ward it off by the use of this standard remedy. But if it has already crept in, put it to rout. You can do it, by the use of the "Favorite Prescription." It is guaranteed to give satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be returned.

For biliousness, sick headache, indigestion, and constipation, take Dr. Pierce's Pellets.

HOPE FOR THE SICK.

One Remedy for One Disease.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a single bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of domestic remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The Hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The Specific for Catarrh cures Catarrh and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. Fever and Ague is addressed by a specific for Fever and Ague, and for female weakness—a general tonic and blood builder that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility. These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease has been published and may be had free on application by HOSPITAL REMEDY COMPANY, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

MY EAST.

O love, albeit your eyes are blue,
And lily white your slender hands,
I dream, whene'er I look on you,
Of golden orient lands.

Mayhap it is the amber tinge
That suns the ripples of your hair,
Or your drooped eyelid's curved fringe
That sweetly wafts me there.

Mayhap it is your brow that vies
With almond blooms that fall and float;
Mayhap it is your low replies
Clear as a bulbul's note.

Or your lip-line that redly shows
Like the pomegranate's ruddy heart;
Or yet your cheek so like the rose
When its pink petals part.

I have no need to travel far
To seek the cloudless climes of blue,
For, love, you are my morning star—
I find my East in you!

—Clinton Scollard, in America.

BESIEGED.

Thrilling Incident of the Sioux Outbreak of 1862.

One morning in the summer of 1862, Joe Harvey stood in the doorway of his country store, and gazed in wonder across the Minnesota prairies. To the right and the left, far away, arose great columns of smoke, which seemed to ascend to the very heavens.

Presently, Mrs. Harvey came up from the spring with a bucket of water. She paused at the store door and asked:

"Joe, what is the meaning of all that smoke west of us?"

"That's what I've been puzzling my head over," he answered.

"It can't be the prairie, for that is too green to burn."

"No," replied her husband; "besides, the smoke would be more scattered if it came from prairie-fires."

At that moment, Harry Grey, the handsome young brother of Mrs. Harvey, dashed up on his pony. The young man showed evidence of great excitement, while the pony was covered with foam and seemed ready to fall to the ground from extreme fatigue.

"The Indians!" he shouted, pointing toward the columns of smoke in the west. "The Sioux have made an outbreak and are butchering the settlers and burning their cabins."

"My God!" cried Mrs. Harvey. "What will we do?"

"There is only one alternative," replied her husband.

"What is that?" she asked, with blanched face.

"Hitch to the light wagon and drive for our lives to the next settlement east of us," he said.

"Stop, Joe!" cried Harry, detaining him as he started toward the little shed where the horses were kept. "That is the worst thing you can do. The Indians are all around us. Bloodthirsty bands are guarding every pass and road leading from our settlement."

"What do you advise?"

"Fight the red villians right here," answered Harry.

"But won't that be foolhardy?"

"Not half as much so as driving right into one of their traps. The Sioux are in every direction."

"Well, I'm no coward," said Harvey. "When I have to fight I will fight. But how are we to fortify ourselves here?"

"Have you plenty of arms and ammunition in the store?" asked Harry Grey, his keen, dark eyes surveying the premises.

"Yes. I just got in a supply."

"Then why not turn that milk-house into a fort?" suggested Harry.

"The very place!" ejaculated Harvey. "We'll try it, and may God help us against the red fiends."

The milk-house was a low, stone structure, built over a spring of excellent water. It had just been finished, and was a strong, roomy cave, the floor and wall of which were thick and solid, made of rock which Harvey and Harry had blasted from the open ground around the milk house. The roof was strong and well-sodded.

The milk-house would be a capital place to use as a fort, for the ground on every side around it was smooth, offering no opportunity whatever for their enemies to creep up.

They wasted no words in getting their fort ready for a siege.

While Mrs. Harvey and Harry hastened to convey food, bedding and goods from the store and cabin, Harvey, with a strong iron bar, made loop-holes in the stone walls. He had muscular arms, and in a short time he had made several of them; with a huge auger he then bored three more in the heavy oaken door.

As they were busily preparing their fort for the expected attack, they were joined by two young settlers, who had claims three miles away. They had been in the woods hunting stray cattle and had had a very narrow escape from a band of Sioux, who had given them a long chase.

These young fellows needed no invitation to help, but began work with a will. The little party did not forget to keep their eyes open for the Indians, however.

Sooner than is required to tell it, the best that was in the cabin and the little country store had been transferred to the milk-house. The stock had been driven by one of the men into a dense timber a short distance beyond the store, where the Sioux would not be likely to find them.

Harvey and one of the settlers had prepared a barricade before the door. They drove several stout posts, which had been well soaked in water to prevent their taking fire, into the ground before the door, leaving only space enough for one person to pass at a time. The Indians would have a poor chance to come at them from that way.

Meanwhile Harry Grey, with the assistance of the other settler, had prepared a torpedo holding several pounds of powder, which they skillfully concealed under rocks and dirt on the brink of a deep hole that had been made by blasting out the rock. This hole was not commanded by the loopholes and would be sure to afford the enemy an excellent point of attack. A rude trench was rudely dug from the milk-house, and by aid of some long planks, a train of powder was arranged. Then the earth was put back so carefully as to leave no suspicions of what had been done.

It was nearly ten o'clock when Harry exclaimed excitedly:

"There come some of the villains!"

When the little party of whites shut themselves in their fort, the Sioux were tearing along over the prairies not a mile away.

Grasping their loaded guns, they awaited the coming of the red men.

They had not long to wait.

From the loop-holes the white men counted twenty-seven Indians, all mounted on good ponies. Every one carried something which he had plundered from the settlers' cabins, and a few had fresh scalps at their belts.

The rode up to the little store boldly. Evidently they had seen the hasty flight to the milk-house, but gave no hint of having done so. Among the band, Mrs. Harvey recognized several whom she had kindly supplied with food and other articles not many days before.

Yells of savage indignation came from the Sioux who entered the cabin and store, to find them already stripped of their most desirable contents. A council was held immediately.

They expected every moment to see the flames devour their buildings. But, instead, an Indian who had been in the settlement often and had picked up a little imperfect English, left the council and approached the retreat of the whites, giving the peace sign.

He stopped when within a hundred feet of the fort, and called:

"Runnin' Dog want talk with store-man," meaning Harvey, who had built up considerable trade with the Indians in his little isolated rural store.

"What do you want to talk about?" Harvey shouted back through one of the loop-holes:

"Runnin' Dog and braves want heap powder—shot!"

"To kill the whites?" demanded Harvey.

"No kill pale-faces; Sioux friendly," replied the wily Running Dog.

"What do you mean, then, by riding around this way?"

"Some braves get fire-water, drink heap, make heap noise, ride over white man's settlement; but no kill white man," answered the Indian.

"Then ride away if you don't mean fight."

"Why whites go into store house?" asked Running Dog.

"We thought a change might be good for our health."

"Will store-man come out?"

"No, the air outside isn't good for him."

"Then Sioux burn store and cabin," answered the Indian.

"That is what we have been expecting ever since your bloody gang rode up. So pitch in!"

And so the conference ended.

Running Dog returned to his fellows, to whom he lost no time in fully translating the dialogue between himself and the settler.

With whoop and howl some of the Indians opened fire on the fort, while others prepared for a great bonfire.

The shots against the fort had no effect whatever. Very soon store and cabin were wrapped in wild flames, and the Sioux began a little war-dance around them, leaping and yelling in fiendish glee.

The store being a log structure, the roof fell in before the walls. As the Sioux leaped and chanted wildly about their bonfire, suddenly there was a great explosion, followed almost instantly by shrieks of terrible agony. Burning logs were hurled in every direction, and intense excitement reigned among the red war-dancers.

Harry Grey only gave a grim smile as his companions looked inquiringly at him.

"I merely placed a half-keg of powder where I knew it would do us a friendly turn if the Sioux burned the store," he said.

The smoke somewhat subsiding after the explosion, the besieged were able to count eight Indians killed and several badly mangled. Among the slain was Running Dog.

The buildings consumed were the only shelter from which the Indians could attack them, and they were now lost to them. The gang clearly realized the strength of the little garrison, and possessed caution enough not to attempt a rush upon it.

The band soon rode off, taking their dead and wounded with them. This gave the besieged whites an opportunity to leave the milk-house, kindle fires, and prepare food enough to last several days. Harvey and one of the settlers attended to strengthening the fort and perfecting arrangements for a long siege. There was no telling when relief would reach them.

The shadows of evening were lengthening across those sadly desolated prairies, when the whites beheld a long line of Sioux steal out of the forest and ride like demons toward them.

Quickly entering their fort, they had the door barricaded, and every gun ready for use when the band, which at this time numbered forty-one, rode up and halted just beyond rifle range.

Harry Grey had counted them from a loop-hole. Suddenly his ruddy face grew pale, and he was observed to tremble as if an ague had seized him.

"The fiends!" came from his ashen lips.

"What is it?" cried Harvey.

"Look!" and he pointed toward the band of Sioux.

Harvey sprang to a loop-hole and surveyed the object of Harry's emotion. He started greatly as his eyes fell on a lovely white girl, with plump, graceful figure, long golden hair streaming wildly away from her scared, colorless face, and with her arms tied cruelly behind her back. She was a captive in the midst of a band of merciless Indians!

"Heavens!" ejaculated Harvey, "it is Daisy Murdock."

"Yes, and she is a captive in the hands of that fiendish band. Heavens! what can I do?" he cried, in wild excitement.

Daisy Murdock was the only child of a settler who had taken "a claim" about fifteen miles south of Harvey's store. The Murdocks and the Greys had been old neighbors in Illinois, and had come to Minnesota together. Daisy and Harry Grey had been lovers from childhood, and the coming Christmas had been appointed as a suitable time for celebrating their nuptials in good old-fashioned frontier style. Harry had intended by then to have his own farm out on Cedar Creek sufficiently improved to install Daisy as mistress of a home of their own.

After considerable parley among themselves, the Sioux marched the captive toward the fort. The Indians halted and bade her proceed, at the same time keeping her covered with their rifles. This was intense torture to Harry, and, had he not been restrained, he would have rushed bodly to his death in the attempt to rescue the girl whom he loved.

The captive was allowed to come up within twenty-five feet of the barricade, then the Sioux called to her to halt. In a voice which she strove in vain to render steady the captive told them she had been made to come and demand their surrender. But, in lower tones, she warned them against doing so, saying they would only be butchered without mercy.

Harvey was alert and telling Harry to unbarricade the door, he explained briefly to the poor captive that her rescue would then and there be attempted.

Poor Daisy! Her face was white as that of the dead, but she replied that she was ready.

"Then stoop low to keep the bullets above you, and run swiftly toward the door. Harry will meet you there," advised Harvey from a loop-hole.

The Indians were growing impatient, and had demanded her return. There was no further time to waste. Harry Grey sprang to the door to assist the captive, while the others held their guns to the loop-holes.

Daisy Murdock did not lack courage when the proper moment came to exercise it fully. It was a short run, but a veritable run for life and liberty. The Indians fired several times after her, but her stooping motion had made the shots rattle harmlessly over her head. She was soon clasped safely in Harry's arms, which quickly placed her, almost fainting, within the fort.

Then began a siege which lasted one week. Many Indians were killed, but small bands would each day come along, and thus keep the besiegers reinforced. As had been expected, the Sioux found the quarry back of the milk-house, and began an attack from that quarter. The torpedo was exploded at the right moment, killing several and severely wounding a dozen. They tried in every way to burn them out, but with no success.

When the number of Sioux had increased to one hundred, and the whites had begun to consider their case a hopeless one, troops came and drove the red men away.

For miles and miles the direst devastation had been wrought to the homes on these prairies. Not a building remained; only ashes and blackened ruins marked the spots where happy homes had once been.

Daisy Murdock's home had been burned, her father butchered before her own eyes, and she had been taken captive.

By making their fight there on the prairie they had, no doubt, held a large force of the Sioux from committing countless other bloody depredations on other settlers.

In due time their homes were rebuilt, and they were again prosperous. Harry and Daisy never forget to lift grateful hearts to Providence for their preservation during the terrible Sioux outbreak.

FRIENDSHIPS IN CONGRESS.

Personal Friendliness of Some of the Hottest Political Opponents.

You can look down from the gallery of either House on intimacies between professed opponents like that between Steele and Carlisle. The ingenious Mr. Pickwick was not more astonished at amiable relations of the opposing council in the great case of Bardell vs. Pickwick than is the average thick-and-thin partisan by the personal friendliness shown by the hottest orators on the floor for the boldest leaders of the opposition. Every body knows how intimate Senator Cameron and Senator Butler of South Carolina are. How they talk together in the Senate, lunch together, drive together, and hunt and fish together, in closer bonds than either is with any party friend. Allison's friendship with Beck, and Reed's with Randall, are perhaps not so generally known. Hawley has many friends on the Democratic side, and so have Sherman, Morrill, John P. Jones, Evarts, Aldrich, Hale, Sawyer, Spooner and Manderson, while Wade Hampton, Vance, Colquitt, Payne and McPherson are equally popular on the Republican side. Even Edmunds and Hoar have their friends among the Democrats. Hoar still keeps his, but Edmunds seems to grow more reserved continually. He misses Thurman from the Democratic side. They were great cronies. John D. Long was the most popular Republican on the Democratic side of the House. McKinley and Reed are both liked here, and so is Butterworth. Carlisle is, of course, the most popular Democrat on the Republican side, and then come the Breckinridges and Mills—yes, Mills, the particular target of every Republican speaker.—Washington Letter.

Detected by Photographs.

During the last Belgian maneuvers, General van der Smissen had ordered some photographers to be stationed at various points on the maneuver field. At the end of the operations he had the proofs brought to him, and could thereby ascertain that frequently his instructions had been neglected. Thus at the passage of a ford he could see that many soldiers, instead of fastening their cartridge pouches to their rifles, as the instructions prescribe, left them where they were, whereby they got wet. He also observed that no ropes were stretched across the stream to mark the ford and to enable the soldiers to hold fast on in case the current proved too strong. A good many other things the General is said to have found out, and so the photographers will probably become la bete noire of the Belgian Thomas Atkins.—Le Progres Militaire.

A CRIPPLED PATRIOT.

In Times of Peace He Attempted to Prepare for War.

"Do you know that man there?" inquired a citizen of a reporter yesterday.

"O, yes; what about him?"

"You see he's a trifle lame, don't you?"

"Certainly. It's very perceptible."

"Well, he don't think so, and he'd resent your statement if he heard it. But I started out to tell you how he became a cripple. Before the war he was a man of considerable means. He was finely educated but very eccentric. His language was high flown and his dignity unappoachable. He was a natural aristocrat, a confirmed egotist, and proud beyond any justification. He exacted deference wherever he could and invested the most ordinary events of life with all the pomp and ceremony he could inject. When it became apparent that the civil war was inevitable, his pride suggested that he would at once be called upon to fill some important command. He was not fitted for it, but determined at once to acquire a military education such as would enable him to shine at once in the new sphere of action. His only fire-arm was a flint-lock smooth-bore, handed down as a heirloom and reminder of pioneer struggles. Armed with this he made the back porch a drilling ground, after studying the tactics. He was commander as well as troops. It was his first day of active drill. His commands were not after the most approved manual, but he obeyed them explicitly.

"Shoulder arms!"

"Present arms!"

"Ground arms!"

"Rest arms."

"Shoulder arms!"

"Right shoulder shift arms!"

"Carry arms!"

"Forward march!"

"Right oblique, march!"

"In obeying this order Mr. —— suddenly disappeared from view. There was a crash and a thud. Mrs. —— rushed through the back door and shaking with dread looked down through the open cellar way. One step was split off. The old family smooth-bore was a shattered relic. Mr. —— looked like a participator in a steamboat explosion.

"'O, my dear Mr. ——, are you killed?'

"'Mrs. ——,' said Mr. ——, whose dignity survived and whose pride was aroused, 'Mrs. ——, go into the house and attend to your own domestic affairs. What do you know about military tactics? I have taught you how to live, I will show you how to die.'

"Mr. —— isn't dead yet, but that limp is the result of his only drill, and he never got nearer a battle field than Detroit.'—Detroit Post.

THE CROTON AQUEDUCT.

Air That Cost New York's Tax-Payers Five Dollars a Cubic Yard.

Mr. Charles Barnard in his article in the Century, on the Croton aqueduct, gives an "object lesson" in "practical politics." He presents two photographs, reproduced mechanically, which show certain of the numerous caves at the side of the arches, which were filled with air, at about five dollars a cubic yard. Says Mr. Barnard:

"There is a square hole cut in the arched ceiling, and with much scrambling we crawl through and sit down directly on the top of the tunnel lining. The space between the lining and the rock is not high enough to enable one to stand upright, yet high enough for a comfortable seat on the top of the work. The cave-like place extends for some distance in both directions. The candles light up the wet, ragged rocks overhead, some heavy timbers in the distance, and the clean red bricks of the arch.

"This space over the tunnel lining is only one of a great number that have been found at different points along the aqueduct. They appear sometimes at the top, sometimes at the sides, sometimes extend completely over the tunnel lining from side to side. In the specifications for the work all these spaces are marked as filled up solid with rubble masonry. The masonry is necessary to the strength of the aqueduct, and it was to be supplied in all cases for the whole length of the tunnel. It was not so supplied in this and in many other places. Moreover, the specifications call for three, and in some cases five, courses of solid brick laid in cement. The upper course in this cave is not laid in cement at all. The bricks on the top of the arch are as clean as on the day they were made. No cement was used, and the bricks were merely laid loosely in place and left there. The hole cut in the arch was made by the engineers to test the work, which was found wanting.

"That this statement may not seem exaggerated, two pictures are presented on the preceding pages from photographs taken in two of these caves. In the first, the hole cut in the arch is shown with one course of brick properly laid, two courses badly laid, and two courses simply left out. More bad work can also be seen in the other picture. The rock above is the roof of the excavation, and all the empty space represented in the picture was paid for by the citizens of New York at the rate of about five dollars a cubic yard. In some of these caves cross-walls were built to deceive the engineer and lead him to think all the space had been built in solid. In one of the pictures such a cross-wall is shown with a hole knocked in it to show that another cave existed beyond. It is now known that these defects occur in the larger part of the aqueduct, and that over one million dollars were at one time paid out for work that was never performed, and that was certified to have been performed by those appointed to watch the work.

"Happily the faults of which these pictures are such unimpeachable witnesses have been repaired, at the expense of the contractors, but they resulted in a complete change in the administration of the work, and the whole business is now but a bad memory. We can only hopefully look forward to the day when 'practical politics' shall no longer rule our great public works. The time is fast coming when the selfish greed of political 'halls' and the personal necessities of aspirants for public office can no longer thrive on the robbery of the people. Some day the American people will insist that neither Governors nor mayors shall appoint public servants at the behest of political managers."

SAVED BY THE GOVERNOR.

Why a Vile and Hardened Criminal Did Not Get His Pardon.

In one of the Indiana prisons is a convict who is serving a life sentence for the commission of one of the most horrible of crimes. It has been said that no man is so bad that he has not friends. The friends of this man from the beginning of his sentence have never ceased to work for his pardon. Influential citizens and public officials have been induced to write personal letters to all the Governors who have held office since the term of confinement began. Petition after petition has been prepared and hundreds of signatures secured.

It is related that at one time a Governor was almost persuaded to pardon the man. The sentiment in his favor seemed fairly overwhelming. As a last precaution he sent for his private secretary to talk over the whole case with the prisoner himself. The prisoner told his story forcibly, but so glibly as to indicate that he had carefully prepared it and committed it to memory. As his recital closed he drew a photograph of a beautiful young woman from his pocket.

"The first thing I shall do when I am released will be to marry this girl," he said.

"Who is she?" asked the visitor.

"She is Miss M——," he replied, "and is the daughter of one of the richest and proudest families in the city of ——. She will marry me the minute I am set free."

"How do you happen to know her?"

"Oh, that's all right. She visited the prison one time and I got acquainted with her. She fell in love with me at first sight. Don't worry about me. I'm solid with her."

The secretary looked at the photograph again. The face shown there was delicate and refined, and every line indicated the confiding trustfulness of innocent girlhood. He looked at the prisoner. In his eye was a wicked leer of triumph. Evil and sin were stamped upon every feature. When the secretary made report to the Governor he told the story of the photograph. The Chief Executive pondered over it awhile, then, bringing his fist down upon his desk with a force that set all its light furniture to rattling, he said:

"The photograph settles it. That sweet girl and the happiness of her home and friends must not be subjected to ruin and misery by any act of mine. The prisoner must serve his time."—Indianapolis News.

Not for Cash.

"Doctor," he said as they met on the platform of the street car, "can I get a little advice of you?"

"For cash?"

"Well, no. I simply want to ask a question or two, and being I'm an old patient of yours you won't think of charging me."

"Go ahead."

"Well, my feet are troubling me and I thought"——

"Say! Cut 'em right off!" interrupted the doctor. "I've often wondered why you didn't do it. I've got to get off here—good night!" —Detroit Free Press.

How She Took the Oath.

Many indeed and various are the anecdotes told in connection with oath taking. A very pious and painfully guileless old lady was once called as a witness before Mr. Tennyson-D'Eyncourt, the Bow street police magistrate.

"Is it a fact, your honor?" asked the lady, "that I must take an oath?"

"Certainly, madam," replied Mr. D'Eyncourt.

"But I don't like to do so!" exclaimed the lady.

"You must do so or go to prison," said Mr. D'Eyncourt. "Every witness has got to swear."

The lady was hard to be persuaded. For a long time she held out against what she termed a cruel injustice, but finally consented to comply with the magistrate's orders. She then took the Book and, to the surprise and amusement of the whole court, rapped out a tremendous oath, after which she covered her face and cried in pitiful tones: "Heaven forgive me, but I had to do it!"—Pittsburg Dispatch.

The New Speaker's First Speech.

The first public speech Tom Reed was ever known to have made is amusingly described by Mrs. Libby, an elderly matron of Old Orchard:

"I carried Tom Reed to school the first day he ever went," said Mrs. Libby, as she smoothed her apron with her hands. "It was to the school on Brackett street in Portland. Thomas was a tow headed little fellow then. Once, when we were all done, the teacher asked: 'Are there any others who have a piece they can speak?' Up got Thomas and said: 'I know one:

'Old Jim Crow came riding by,
Says I, "Old man, your horse will die."
Says he, "If he dies I'll tan his skin
And if he lives I'll ride him again."'

And that's all I know.'

"That is, I suppose, the first speech Thomas ever made. I wonder if he remembers it now. He had a funny little voice, but he was so earnest about reciting his piece that it made us all laugh."—Washington Capital.

BURDETTE'S MUSINGS.

What the Humorist Heard and Saw on a Railroad Train.

Brakemen on train other day, one at each end of car. Never called stations alike. Never called stations, in fact. Tried to, may be, but missed it. Whistle shrieked, front brakeman looked in, roared "State Journal! State Journal!" Wondered why town named after newspaper; must be type of American town. Rear brakeman looked in; yelled "Wait, woman!" Woman standing up to go out fell into seat like shot. Train slowed up at station; read name over door—"Natrona."q

Young man gets on at Harrisburg. Breezy man; two grips, one large, one small. Turns seat for himself. Put high slick shiny silk hat in rack. Puts umbrella and cane with peacemaker handles in rack. Puts on silk traveling cap. Removes shoes, puts on allegator slippers. Takes off coat; takes lounging jacket from large valise; puts on. Takes cigar from bran new case and sticks it in mouth. Isn't in smoking car, so doesn't light it; merely advertises fact that has it. Opens book; looks too sweet and comfortable for any thing. General impression among all women in car that young man is Old Traveler from Roverville, Wander County, this State. Commercial traveler curling up for nap remarks, in low tones, audible from sleeper to smoker—"First Trip." Every body laughs. Young Oldtraveler, of Wander County, looks haughty and unconcerned. Train pulls out. Conductor comes along—great consternation—young Mr. Oldtraver on wrong train—wants to go to Philadelphia—this train howling along to Pittsburgh—first regular stop Huntington. Bell-rope pulled. Young man scoops his things together—dumped out into the yards near Rockport. Has company of yard men, freight brakemen and switchmen, while he dresses. Pleasant men; much given to light raillery and badinage. Know the young man had pleasant time with them. Know also he will leave some things home next time he travels. Every body young once.

Family party get on at Bellwood. Mother and little boy in one seat; father and little girl in other. Mother warns husband—"Now be sure, don't let Nettie go to sleep." Says he won't. Gentle sound as of snoring in high key with atmospheric disturbances, accompanied by childish snuffles. Father sound asleep; Nettie sound asleep in his arms. Mother jabs boy viciously two or three times, as he nods. Finally drops off herself. Head hangs back over seat. Hat falls off in my lap. Hate to put it on floor. Hold it best I know how, blushing painfully, conscious of awkwardness. Giggling girls in next seat. Know they are laughing at me, but hate to look around. 'Fraid cat. 'Altoona!" Takes two brakemen to waken family. Woman looks angrily and with dark suspicion in glance at me as takes hat from me. Evidently wants me to understand she thinks I took it off her head with intention of keeping it. No difficulty at all in understanding look. Turns, reproachfully, to husband—"Oh, George! After all I said you let Nettie go to sleep! How could you?" I cast glance of sympathy toward George as he passes out, knowing he will get my share of oration. Doesn't seem to mind it.

Powerful tired of railway travel. Six days week on wheels not travel; business. Roar and rattle, crash and bang never out of head; jolt and jar, and jump and swing, with noise thrown in, fairly maddening. No fun. Nice enough one day, hard work every day for five months, Told manager this year, charge $150 extra for all banquets after lecture. Much harder work to attend banquets than to lecture. Man rides fron six a. m. to 7:15 p. m., talks two hours—full day. Banquet no fun. Banquet Business. Same way with "Seeing few friends after lecture." Much rather see devil. More entertaining; not so fatiguing.

Railway going not travel, anyhow. Simply transportation. Picks you up in Brooklyn, sets you down in Chicago. That's all. Transportation isn't traveling. Steamboat nice way to travel. But rivers don't go everywhere. Miss heap of scenery by clinging to river. Stage, too, dusty and rough. Ideal travel, route and mode—canal. No reckless speed. Get tired of boat, jump off on tow path and walk. Fond of excitement, help boy drive mules. Great scheme; more canals; railroads all freight lines; transportation of pigs and people in great hurry. Canal boat for leisure class and "hupper suckles." Ever carried into effect hope to have boat named after me.—Robert J. Burdette, in Brooklyn Eagle.

Man Is Composed of Air.

The following is from Justus Liebig, the greatest chemist of the nineteenth century: "Science has demonstrated that man, the being which performs the greatest wonders, is formed of condensed air, or solidified and liquefied gasses; that he lives on condensed as well as on uncondensed air, and by means of the same agent, moves the heaviest weights with the velocity of the wind. But the strangest part of the matter is that thousands of these tabernacles formed of condensed air are going on two legs, destroying other forms of condensed air which they may need for food or clothing, or on account of their power, destroying each other in pitched battles, by means of the same materials of which they are composed. Chemistry supplies the clearest proof that, so far as concerns this, the ultimate and most minute composition and structure, which is beyond the reach of our senses, man is, to all appearances, identical with the ox, or even with the animals lowest in the scale of creation."

His Lack of Biblical Knowledge.

Editor of Arkansas Thunderbolt (to Assistant)—Cramp, you used the quotation in this morning's paper: "Vice is a monster of such frightful mien that, to be hated, you need only to look at it." I am almost sure that's wrong.

Assistant—That's the way I remember it. The words may not be exact, but the idea is there.

Editor (severely)—Cramp, if you expect to keep your job you've got to read up on the Bible!—Chicago Tribune.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14 1890

R. J. Whittaker has returned from Bakersfild.

Chris. Eisle was down from Bishop on Wednesday.

Mr. J. W. Robinson, of Carson, is in town.

Mr. Ben. T. Williams was down from Bishop early in the week.

Judge Ublemeyer and Jake Tracy of Big Pine are in town.

Considerable business was transacted at the local Land Office to-day.

J. W. P. Laird Esq. has been in the Lit-Lake country during the past week.

Mr. J. C. Crocker, of Big Pine, got back from Bakersfield at the end of last week.

Messrs. Dormer, Hofer, Lee, Ardery and Hallock, of Carson, are visiting in the valley.

Hon. Trenmore Coffin came down from Carson last Monday on business relating to the Eastside Canal.

Mr. George H. Shedd has sold his ranch at Fish Springs to Judge Hannah. It is a fine place containing 320 acres of first-class land.

Mr. H. M. Yerington, Superintendent of the C. & C. railroad has got back home to Carson after a visit of several weeks in the East.

Mrs. J. A. McKenzie has returned to Darwin after a six months visit among relatives and friends in the East. She was accompanied by her brother.

Last Monday an election was held for city officers in Salt Lake City. The Mormons were defeated by good majorities and there is general rejoicing thereat.

Mr. J. H. Stoutenborough, Miss Carrie Stoutenborought and Miss Yandell, of Bishop, have been visiting friends at Independence and vicinity during the week.

Sheriff Eldred has gone to Resting Spring on legal business. The place is in Death Valley in the southeastern part of the county. It will take about ten days to make the trip.

The G. A. R. party at Independence on Saturday of next week is certain be a pleasant affair. Every patriotic American will be glad to join in celebrating the birthday of Washington.

Mr. De La Cour Carrol left Independence Thursday morning for Modesto. Mr. Carroll was here seven months and during that time gained many warm friends and not a single enemy.

Mr. J. H. Roberts was in town some days this week. He says the activity in borax continues as lively as ever in Saline Valley and he is confident a great deal will be done there during the coming summer.

Mr. Dan. Cofer has got a contract for repairing the Independence bridge across Owens River. Both ends of the bridge are in place and uninjured. Two spans in the middle were swept away and these will be replaced.

Mr. E. Robinson and his sister, Mrs. Vinson, and Miss Nora Vinson left Independence last Tuesday morning for Red Bluff, Tehama county. Mr. Robinson took along his two little girls, intending to leave them with his sister.

Two car-loads of ore were sent down from the Poleta mine to be worked at the Maxim last Monday. The mill could not be started immediately for want of wood, but that material being now supplied no doubt the mill is running by this time.

A few evenings ago the scribe was lucky enough to hear a rehearsal of the Mikado. If the public performance of the opera on the 28th shall be as good as this rehearsal—and there is not a doubt that it will be better—the entertainment will be the best ever given at Independence.

Mr. Thomas Twaddle arrived at Independence last Monday from Daggett. Mr. Twaddle is a merchant at Dagget and is interested in mines in the southeastern part of Inyo county. He left town on Wednesday for that country in company with Sheriff Eldred for that country.

A couple of young men who came to Big Pine recently from Kern county went prospecting in the foothills west from Big Pine. They struck a ledge of quartz and from three hundred pounds of the ore took out one hundred and fifty dollars. No report is given as to how big the ledge is.

The work of re-timbering the Union shaft at Cerro Gordo is nearly completed. When this job shall be finished it is very likely that the force of miners will be largely increased and the work of developing the mine be pushed vigorously. In the mean time good ore is being taken out of the mine right along and a twelve horse team is kept steadily on the road hauling the ore to Keeler.

Business of all kinds is reported to be much overdone at Bakersfield. Two or three train loads of people are brought there daily from the East. Most of these are working men and the result is that many of them are out of money and cannot find employment. There is a certainty of a splendid season for farming and this cheers the people through the dull times.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Mayr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m., at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening; Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

To The Public.

I wish to place myself right before the people of Inyo county in regard to a report that has been circulated to the effect that one of my first acts after reaching Saline Valley was to jump one of Conn, Trudo & Co.'s claims. The fact is that I located a claim that had been located about a year previous to my location but had not been recorded as required by law, consequently I considered the ground vacant and located it. This action cannot be called "jumping" a claim. But though well knowing that my claim to the ground was strictly valid, after learning that the person who appeared to be most interested in the matter, and was most desirous of securing the ground, was a man who had shown me many courtesies even from our first meeting, after consulting with my associates, I went to him and offered to deed him back the ground, and have since done so in due legal form. J. H. ROBERTS.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

And so our hero had already begun to find out. Here, before he had been forty-eight hours in Honham, a fresh cause of trouble had arisen. He had seen Ida de la Molle again, and after an interval of between five and six years had found her face yet more charming than he had before. In short, he had fallen in love with it, and being a sensible man, he did not conceal this fact from himself. Indeed, the truth was that he had been in love with her all these years, though he had never looked at the matter in that light. At the least the pyre had been gathered and laid, and did but require the touch of the match to burn up merrily enough. And now this was supplied, and at the first glance of Ida's eyes the magic flame began to hiss and crackle, and he knew that nothing short of a convulsion or a deluge would put it out.

Men of the stamp of Harold Quaritch generally pass through three stages with reference to the other sex. They begin in their youth by making a goddess of one of them, and finding out their mistake. Then for many years they look upon woman as the essence and incarnation of all evil and a thing no more to be trusted than a jaguar. Ultimately, however, this folly wears itself out—probably in proportion as the old affection fades and dies away—and is replaced by contempt and regret that so much should have been wasted on that which was so little worth. Then it is that the danger comes, for then a man puts forth his second venture, puts it forth with fear and trembling, and with no great hope of seeing a golden Argosy sailing into port. And if it sinks or is driven back by adverse winds and frowning skies, then there is an end of his legitimate dealings with such frail merchandise.

And now he, Harold Quaritch, was about to put forth this second venture, not of his own desire or free will indeed, but because his reason and judgment were overmastered. In short, to put it briefly, he had fallen in love with Ida de la Molle when he first saw her five years ago, and was now in the process of discovering the fact. There he sat in his chair in the old, half furnished room, which he proposed to turn into his dining room, and groaned in spirit over this portentous discovery. What had become of his fair prospect of quiet years sloping gently downward, and warm with the sweet, drowsy light of afternoon? How was it that he had not known those things that belonged to his peace? And probably it would end in nothing; was it likely that such a splendid young woman as Ida would care for a superannuated army officer, with nothing beyond four or five hundred a year and a Victoria cross—which he never wore—to recommend him? Probably if she married at all she would try to marry some one who would assist to retrieve the fallen fortunes of her family, which it was absolutely beyond his power to do. Altogether the outlook did not please him, as he sat there far into the watches of the night, and sucked at his empty pipe. So little did it please him, indeed, that when at last he rose to find his way to bed up the old oak staircase—the only imposing thing in Molehill—he had almost made up his mind to give up the idea of living at Honham at all, to sell the place and emigrate to Vancouver's Island or New Zealand, and thus place an impassable barrier between himself and that sweet, strong face, which somehow seemed to have acquired a touch of sternness since last he had looked upon it.

Ah, wise resolution of quiet night, whither do you go to in the garish light of day? To heaven, perhaps, with the mist wreaths and the dew drops.

When the squire got back to the castle he found his daughter still sitting up in the drawing room.

"What, not gone to bed, Ida?" he said.

"No, father, I was going, and then I thought that I would wait to hear what all this was about Janter and the Moat farm. It is best to get it over."

"Yes, yes, my dear—yes, but there is not much to tell you. Janter has thrown up the farm after all; and George says there is not another tenant to be had for love or money. He tried one man, who said that he would not have it at 5 shillings an acre, as prices are."

"That is bad enough, in all conscience," said Ida, pushing at the fire irons with her foot. "What is to be done?"

"What is to be done?" answered her father, irritably. "How can I tell you what is to be done? I suppose that I must take the place in hand, and that is all."

"Yes, but that costs money, does it not?"

"Of course it does; it costs about four thousand pounds."

"Well," said Ida, looking up, "and where is all that sum to come from? We have not got four thousand pounds in the world."

"Come from? Why, I suppose that I must borrow it on the security of the land."

"Would it not be better to let the place go out of cultivation," she answered, "rather than risk all that sum of money?"

"Go out of cultivation! Nonsense, Ida, how can you talk like that? Why, that strong land would be ruined for a generation to come."

"Perhaps it would; but surely it would be better that it should be ruined than that we should be. Father, dear," she said, appealingly, laying one hand upon his shoulder, "do be frank with me, and tell me what our position really is. I see you wearing yourself out about business from day to day, and I know that there is never any money for anything—scarcely enough to keep the house going; and yet you never tell me what we really owe—and I think I have a right to know."

The squire turned impatiently. "Girls have no head for these things," he said, "so what is the use of talking about it?"

"But I am not a girl; I am a woman of six-and-twenty; and putting other things aside, I am almost as much interested in your affairs as you are yourself," she said, with determination. "I cannot bear this sort of thing any longer. I see that abominable man, Mr. Quest, continually hovering about here like a bird of ill omen, and I cannot stand it; and I tell you what it is, father, if you don't tell me the whole truth at once, I shall cry," and she looked as if she meant it.

Now, the old squire was no more impervious to a woman's tears than any other man, and of all Ida's moods, and they were many, he most greatly feared that rare one which took the form of tears. Besides, he loved his only daughter more dearly than anything in the world except one thing—Honham Castle—and could not bear to give her pain.

"Very well," he said, "of course if you wish to know about these things you have a right to. I have wished to spare you trouble, that is all; but as you are so very imperious, the best thing that I can do is to let you have your own way. Still, as it is rather late, if you have no objection, I think that I had better put it off till to-morrow."

"No, no, father. By to-morrow you will have changed your mind. Let us have it now. I want to know how much we really owe and what we have got to live on."

The old gentleman hummed and hawed a little, and after various indications of impatience at last began:

"Well, as you know, our family has for some generations depended upon the land. Your dear mother brought a small fortune with her, five or six thousand pounds, but that was, with the sanction of the trustees, expended upon improvements to the farms and in paying off a small mortgage. Well, for many years the land brought in about two thousand a year, but somehow we always found it difficult to keep within that income. For instance, I found it necessary to repair the gateway, and you have no idea of the expense in which those repairs landed me. Then your poor brother James cost a lot of money, and always would have the shooting kept up in such an extravagant way. Then he went into the army, and heaven only knows what he cost me there. Your poor brother was very extravagant, my dear, and—well, perhaps I was foolish—I never could say him no. And that was not all of it; for when the poor boy died he left fifteen hundred pounds of debt behind him, and I had to find the money, if it was only for the honor of the family. Of course you know that we cut the entail when he came of age. Well, and then these dreadful times have come upon the top of it all; and, upon my word, at the present moment I don't know which way to turn," and he paused and drummed his fingers uneasily upon a book.

"Yes, father, but you have not told me yet what it is that we owe."

"Well, it is difficult to answer that all in a minute—perhaps twenty-five thousand on mortgage, and a few floating debts."

"And what is the place worth?"

"It used to be worth between fifty and sixty thousand pounds. It is impossible to say what it would fetch now. Land is practically a drug in the market. But things will come round, my dear. It is only a question of holding on."

"Then if you borrow a fresh sum in order to take up this farm, you will owe about thirty thousand pounds, and if you have to pay 5 per cent., as I suppose you do, you will have to pay fifteen hundred a year in interest. Now father, you said that in good times the land brought in two thousand a year, so, of course, it can't bring in so much now. Therefore, by the time that you have paid the interest there will be nothing, or less than nothing, left for us to live on."

Her father winced at the cruel and convincing logic.

"No, no," he said, "it is not so bad as that. You jump to conclusions; but really, if you do not mind, I am very tired, and should like to go to bed."

"Father, what is the good of trying to shirk the thing just because it is disagreeable?" she asked, earnestly. "Do you suppose that it is more pleasant to me to talk about it than it is for you? I know that you are not to blame about it. I know that poor dear James was very thoughtless and extravagant, and that the times are crushing. But to go on like this is only to go to ruin. It would be better for us to live in a cottage on a couple of hundred a year than to try to keep our heads above water here, which we cannot do. Sooner or later these people—Quest, or whoever they are—will want their money back; and then, if they can not have it they will sell the place over our heads. I believe that man Quest wants to get it himself—that is what I believe—and set up as a country gentleman. Father, I know it is a dreadful thing to say, but we ought to leave Honham."

"Leave Honham!" said the old gentleman, jumping up in his agitation. "What nonsense you talk, Ida! How can I leave Honham? It would kill me at my age. How can I do it? And, besides, who is to look after the farms and all the business? No, no, we must hang on and trust to Providence. Things may come round, something may happen; one can never tell in this world."

"If we do not leave Honham, then Honham will leave us," answered his daughter, with conviction. "I do not believe in chances. Chances always go the wrong way against those who are looking for them. We shall be absolutely ruined, that is all."

"Well, perhaps you are right, perhaps you are right, my dear," said the old gentleman, wearily. "I only hope that my time may come first. I have lived here all my life, and I know that I could not live anywhere else. But God's will be done. And now, my dear, go to bed."

She leaned down and kissed him, and as she did so saw that his eyes were filled with tears. Not trusting herself to speak, for she felt for him too deeply to do so, she turned away and went, leaving the old man sitting there with his gray head bowed upon his breast.

CHAPTER VI.

LAWYER QUEST.

The day following the conversation described in the last chapter was one of those glorious autumn mornings which sometimes comes as a faint compensation for the utter vileness and bitter disappointment of the season which, in this country, we dignify by the name of summer. Notwithstanding his vigil and melancholy of the night before, the squire was up early; and Ida, who between one thing and another had not had the best of nights, heard his loud, cheery voice shouting about the place for "George."

Looking out of her bedroom window, she soon perceived that functionary himself—a long, lean, powerful looking man with a melancholy face and a twinkle in his little gray eyes—hanging about the front steps. Presently her father emerged in a brilliant but ancient dressing gown, his white locks waving in the breeze.

"Here, George! Where are you, George?"

"Here I be, sir."

"Ah, yes; then why don't you say so? Here I have been shouting myself hoarse for you."

"Yes, squire," replied the imperturbable George, "I have been standing here for the last ten minutes, and I heard you."

"You heard me! then why the dickens didn't you answer?"

"Because I didn't think that you wanted me, sir. I saw that you hadn't finished your letter."

"Well, then, you ought to. You know very well that my chest is weak, and yet I have to go hallooing all over the place after you. Now look here, have you got that fat pony of yours here?"

"Yes, squire, the pony is here; and if it be fat it bean't for the want of movement."

"Very well, then, take this letter," and he handed him an epistle sealed with a tremendous seal. "Take this letter to Mr. Quest at Boisingham, and wait for an answer. And look here, see you are about the place at 11 o'clock, for I expect Mr. Quest to see me about the Moat farm."

"Yes, sir."

"I suppose that you have heard nothing more from Janter, have you?"

"No, squire, nothing. He means to get the place at his own price or chuck it."

"And what is his price?"

"Five shillings an acre. You see, sir, it's this way. That army gent, Major Boston, as is agent for all the college lands down the valley, he be a poor weak fool; and when all these tenants come to him and say that they must either have the land at five shillings an acre or go, he gets scared, he dew, and down goes the rent of some of the best meadow land in the country from thirty-five shillings to five. Of course it don't signify to him not a half penny—the college must pay him his salary all the same—and he don't know no more about farming, nor land, nor northing, than my old mare yinder. Well, and what comes of it? Of course every tenant on the place hears that those college lands are going for five shillings an acre, and they prick up their ears and say they must have the land at the same figger; and it's all owing that Boston varmint, who ought to be kicked through every holl on the place and then drowned to dead in a dike."

"Yes, you're right there, George; that silly man is a public enemy, and ought to be treated as such; but the times are very bad, with corn down to twenty-nine—very bad."

"I'm not saying that they ain't bad, squire," said his retainer, his long face lighting up; "they are bad, cruel bad, bad for everybody. And I'm not denying that they are bad for the tenants; but if they are bad for the tenants, they are wus for the landlord. It all comes on his shoulders in the long run. If men find that they can get land at five shillings an acre that's worth twenty, why it isn't in human nature to pay twenty; and if they find that the landlord must go as they drive him, of course they'll lay on the whip. Why, bless you, sir, when a tenant comes and says that he is very sorry but he finds he can't pay his rent in nine cases out of ten, if you could just look at that man's bank book you'd find that the bank was paid, the tradesmen were paid, the doctor's paid, everybody's paid before he thinks about his rent. Let the landlord suffer because he can't help himself, but, Lord bless you, if a hundred pounds was overdue to the bank, it would have the innards out of him in no time, and he knows it. Now, as for that varmint Janter to tell me that he can't pay fifteen shillings an acre for the Moat farm is nonsense. I only wish I had the capital to take it at the price."

"Well, George," said the squire, "I think that if it can be managed I shall borrow the money and take the farm in hand. I am not going to let Janter have it at five shillings an acre."

"Ah, sir, that's the best way. Bad as times are, it would go hard if I can't make the interest and the rent out of it too. Besides, squire, if you give way about this farm, all the others will come down on you. I'm not saying a word agin your tenants, but where there is money to be made you can't trust no man."

"Well, well," said the squire, "perhaps you are right and perhaps you ain't. Right or wrong, you always talk like Solomon in all his glory. Any way, be off with that note, and let me have the answer as soon as you get back. Mind you don't go loafing and jawing about down in Boisingham, because I want my answer."

"So he means to borrow the money if he can get it," said Ida to herself as she sat, an invisible auditor, doing her hair by the open window. "George can do more with him in five minutes than I can in a week, and I know that he hates Janter. I believe that Janter threw up the farm because of his quarreling with George. Well, I suppose that we must take our chance."

Meanwhile George had mounted his cart and departed upon the road to Boisingham, urging his fat pony along as though he meant to be there in twenty minutes. But so soon as he was well out of the reach of the squire's shouts and sight of the castle gates, he deliberately turned up a by lane and jogged along for a mile or more to a farm where he had a long confabulation with a man about thatching some ricks. Thence he quietly made his way to his own little place, where he proceeded to comfortably get his breakfast, remarking to his wife that he was of opinion that there was no hurry about the squire's letter, as "laryers" wasn't in the habit of coming to office at 8 in the morning.

Breakfast over, the philosophic George got into his cart, the fat pony having been tied up outside, and leisurely drove into the picturesque old town which lay at the head of the valley. All along the main street he met many acquaintances, and with each he found it necessary to stop and have a talk, indeed, with two he had a modest half pint. At length, however, his labor over, he arrived at Mr. Quest's office, that, as all the Boisingham world knows, is just opposite the church, of which Mr. Quest is one of the church wardens, and which was but two years ago beautifully restored, mainly owing to his efforts and generous contributions. Driving up to the small and quiet looking doorway of a very unpretentious building, George descended and knocked, whereon a clerk opened the door, and in answer to his inquiries informed him that he believed Mr. Quest had just come over to the office.

In another minute he was shown into an inner room of the ordinary country office stamp, and there at the table sat Mr. Quest himself.

Mr. Quest was a man of about 40 years of age, rather under than over, with a pale, ascetic cast of face, and a quiet and pleasant, though somewhat reserved, manner. His features were in no way remarkable, with the exception of his eyes, which seemed to have been set in his head owing to some curious error of nature. For whereas his general tone was dark, his hair in particular being jet black, these eyes were gray, and jarred extraordinarily upon their companion features. For the rest, he was a man of some presence, and with the manners of a gentleman.

"Well, George," he said, "what is it that brings you to Bolsingham? A letter from the squire? Thank you. Take a seat, will you, while I look through it. Umph! Wants me to come and see him at 11 o'clock. I am very sorry, but I can't manage that any way. Ah, I see—about the Moat farm. Janter told me he was going to throw it up; and I advised him to do nothing of the sort; but he is a dissatisfied sort of a fellow, Janter is, and Major Boston has upset the whole country side by his very ill advised action about the college lands."

"Janter is a warmint, and Major Boston—begging his pardon for the language—is an ass, sir. Anywhere, there it is; Janter has thrown up, and where I am to find a tenant between now and Michaelmas I don't know; in fact, with the college lands going at five shillings an acre, there ain't no chance."

"Then what does the squire propose to do—take the land in hand?"

(To be Continued.)

Interesting Treasury Figures.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, the total receipts of the United States treasury were $387,050,058.84. Nearly $244,000,000 came from customs and nearly $130,000,000 from internal revenues. Secretary Windom is in favor of tariff revision.

For 1890 the estimated treasury receipts will reach the sum of $385,000,000; the estimated expenses of government $293,000,000. After all available bonds have been purchased and the requirements of the sinking fund satisfied, there will still remain a net surplus of over $43,500,000, some of which Secretary Windom thinks might well be used to enlarge our foreign markets. He is decidedly of opinion that part of the money should be paid to American steamship lines, to enable them to compete with subsidized foreign vessels. He says the United States has encouraged the building of railroads by large grants and subsidies, but has done not one thing for her great maritime interests, refusing even fair compensation for services rendered by steamers to the government.

In 1879 the pension list amounted in round numbers to $35,000,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, $104,000,000 is the amount expected to be required. Apparently the old war veterans are getting wounded over again.

On the other hand, however, the interest on the public debt amounted, in 1879, to more than $105,000,000. This year it will be $36,000,000. We are going to get rid of that money somehow.

Under existing laws, the internal revenue receipts will be increased this year to $135,000,000. The tax on tobacco alone will not be less than $32,000,000 for the coming year unless congress takes it off. In that case the surplus will be reduced by that amount. A tax of over $5,000,000 is at present collected from 6,000,000 gallons of alcohol consumed in the industrial arts and in medicines. Mr. Windom pronounces this tax unjust and says it should be removed.

A HOME FOR A DOLLAR.

Harry Fanning's Lucky Investment Wins Him a House and Lot.

Some men's heads are easily turned by good luck, but such does not seem to be the case with Harry Fanning, who cleared $15,000 on an investment of $1 a little over a month ago. He attends to his business as strictly as ever, and instead of squandering the money which came so easily is going to use it to good purposes. When he invested $1 in a coupon for the November drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery he had no idea that he was going to be one of the lucky ones who drew the big prize, and he could hardly believe that he saw aright when he read the list and learned that he was entitled to one-twentieth of the capital prize of $300,000. He kept the matter to himself and told no one of his great good fortune, but quietly sent his coupon forward for collection by Wells, Fargo & Co.

As rapidly as the Express Company could get the ticket there and the money back it was done, and in less than ten days he had his money counted out to him over their counter in bright $20 pieces. Then the story leaked out and everybody wanted to see what use he would make of his easily acquired wealth. They waited in vain for he did nothing. He was simply preparing his plans to put it to good account. He believes in lotteries now but he also believes in real estate, and being a young married man is desirous of having a home of his own.

With part of the proceeds of his lucky investment he has purchased a lot and will as soon as the weather permits begin the erection of a handsome residence at the corner of Sutter and Oak streets. The building will be a handsome modern style cottage, and although it will be first-class in every respect, Fanning says it will be the cheapest home in the city, as lot, home and furnishings will in reality cost him only a dollar, as that is all the money he will be out of pocket. Architect Beasley has drawn the plans for the building, which will have all the modern conveniences.—Stockton (Cal.) Independent, December 15.

THE GRAVE GETS TIRED YAWNING,

Seemingly, for certain wretched invalids who toddle feebly along, though always looking as if they were going to die, but omitting to do it. They dry up, wither, dwindle away finally, but in the mean time never having robust health, know nothing of the physical enjoyment, the zest of that existence to which they cling with such remarkable tenacity. They are always to be found trying to mend by tinkering at themselves with some trashy remedy, tonic or "pick me up" to give a fillip to digestion, or "help the liver." If such misguided folks would resort and adhere to Hostetter's Stomach Bitters it would be well with them. BRIGHT'S DISEASE CURED.

About two years ago our daughter had congestion of the kidneys, which developed into Bright's Disease. Her body was swollen to an enormous size—measuring 45 inches around the waist, and 18 inches below the knee. After physicians had given up her case, I determined to have her try Dr. Kennedy's "Favorite Remedy," of Rondout, N. Y. Gradually the swelling was reduced from 45 to 29 inches. She began to gain strength, and was able to walk without fatigue. We do not know how to express our gratitude for what it has done for our child. We are confident the Favorite Remedy will do all that is claimed for it—Surely God has blessed it in this case, and we earnestly recommend it to all suffering from kidney disorders.—S. D. Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. FOR THE BLOOD.

Swift's Specific has cured me of a malignant breaking out on my leg, which caused intolerable pain. It was called Eczema by the doctors—four of whom treated me with no relief. I candidly confess that I owe my present good health to S. S. S., which in my estimation is invaluable as a blood remedy. Miss Julia DeWitt, 2227 N. 10th St., St. Louis, Mo.

Our baby when two months old was attacked with Scrofula, which for a long time destroyed her eyesight entirely, and caused us to despair of her life. The doctors failed to relieve her, and we gave Swift's Specific, which soon cured her entirely, and she is now hale and hearty. E. V. Delk, Will's Point, Texas.

COOD NEWS FOR THE AFFLICTED.
A Remarkable Cure of Rheumatism and Catarrh.

Baldwinsville, N. Y.

Pardee Medicine Co.

Gentlemen:—About one year ago I chilled my blood and was under the Doctor's care for about six months when I had a counsel of eight physicians and was given up to die. Soon after, a lady friend came to see me and told me about your great Remedy. She said she had been cured by it after having the rheumatism seven years, and that her rheumatism was first brought on by a cold. At this time I was suffering severe pain all through my body and near my heart. The doctors called it only "frozen blood." Through the persuasion of my friend I procured a bottle. I found ome relief. Seeing this I procured more and was entirely cured by its use; and what was my surprise and pleasure at finding that I was not only cured of my rheumatism, but the catarrh, which had been troubling me for years, and had become very offensive, had entirely left me.

Wishing your remedy every success, and thanking you very much for my double cure, I remain,

Truly yours,
MRS. LUCY BRONSON.

Rochester, N. Y.

Gents:—I was confined to my bed with Inflammatory Rheumatism for over a week; was very badly afflicted, suffering from severe pains in my chest, it was going to my heart. On Thursday the 15th I commenced using Dr. Pardee's Rheumatic Remedy at 9 o'clock, P. M., and on Saturday the 17th, was able to walk all over the house, and have since continued to improve, and take pleasure in recommending it to all who are afflicted with the terrible disease.

MAINE'S RICHEST MAN.

He Makes Himself Pleasant to Strangers and Helps Struggling Youths.

Passengers on the Maine line steamers frequently notice in the pilot-house a tall, slender man, with a long gray beard and the general aspect of a retired steamboat captain or something of that sort. He seems to take a casual interest in the navigation of the vessel, and is evidently on familiar footing with the officers of the boat. Occasionally he may invite some curious passenger into the wheel-house to see the compass or to peep through the glasses. With such he will chat entertainingly about ships, the ocean, the weather or any other ordinary subject. Incidentally it will probably come out that he is president of the line, and he may mention that he is also in the oil-cloth business in New York, though his home is in Maine. He is full of thoughtful suggestions about the best way to avoid sea-sickness, the best state-rooms to try to get for the return trip, and as to other matters relating to the comfort of the trip. The passenger who has been fortunate enough to fall in with him concludes that the Maine line has a most accommodating gentleman for its president, and thinks it would be a good thing for the line if it would hire its president to sail on every trip and make things pleasant for the patrons.

"Going to stop over in Portland and come back with us next trip, are you?" he said to a couple of voyagers recently. 'Well, now, don't you stay in Portland; go over to Cushing's Island, to the hotel there, the Ottawa; it's the only one there is, and you can't miss it. It'll only take half an hour or so to go there, and you can spend one night and two days there a good deal more comfortably than you can in Portland. Just mention at the hotel that I told you to come, Mr. Bailey, president of the steamship line; it won't do you any harm."

These two passengers were more than ever impressed with the geniality of the Maine line's president, and they took his advice. They had the best room at the hotel, and received other attention that made them curious as to where Mr. Bailey got the "pull" that he evidently had with the hotel proprietor. They asked some one who this Mr. Bailey was.

"Bailey? Oh, president of the steamship line? Why, that's Charles S. Bailey. He's the richest man in Maine. Worth ten or fifteen millions and made it all himself. He was about the first oilcloth manufacturer in the country, and is the biggest one yet. He most owns the steamship line and a lot of other things. Close as a chestnut burr, too, about business, but does an almighty lot of good with his money on the quiet. He don't go much on churches, but he has a fancy for helping young men studying for the ministry or young preachers. He'll put up all the money they need right along until they get to mixing in politics or temperance. Then he shuts down on 'em right off. Says a minister's business is to do good to humanity, not to talk politics or prohibition. He'll do most any thing for a man he takes a fancy to. I knew a young man who went to him once and asked him for $5,000. He got it, and was going to give a note for it, 'Never mind that,' he said, 'if you're honest you'll pay me without it, and if you're dishonest you won't pay me any how; your word is all I want.' That's the kind of a man he is, though you'd never suspect it if you had any business dealings with him. You don't mean to say you were talking to him and didn't know who he was? Reckon you don't know much about Maine; there ain't many pies down Eastways that he ain't got a finger in."

The two travelers made up their minds that they had reversed the usual form and had been entertained by an angel unawares.—N. Y. Sun.

VALUE OF SINGING

One of the Most Reliable and Safest Aids to Health.

The time will soon come when singing will be regarded as one of the great helps to physicians in lung diseases, more especially in their incipient state. Almost every branch of gymnastics are employed in one way or another by the doctors, but the simple and natural function of singing has not yet received its full meed of attention. In Italy some years ago statistics were taken which proved that the vocal artists were especially long-lived and healthy, under normal circumstances, while of the brass instrumentalists it was discovered that consumption never claimed a victim among them. Those who have a tendency for consumption should take easy vocal exercises, no matter how thin and weak their voices may seem to be. They will find a result at times far surpassing any relief afforded by medicine. Vocal practice, in moderation, is the best system of gymnastics that can be imagined, many muscles being brought into play that would scarcely be suspected of action in connection with so simple a matter as tone production. Therefore, apart from all considerations, merely as a matter of health, one can earnestly say to the healthy, "Sing! that you may remain so;" and to the weakly, "Sing! that you may become strong."—Boston Musical Herald.

—A small boy was recently reproved by his father, who said: "I am very much disappointed in you, my son." "Oh," the six-year-old replied, evidently without the slightest perception that he was not respectful, "you know how often I have been disappointed in your name."

How He Fixed It.

She objected to the last barrel of flour which the grocer had brought, and after using a few scoopfuls from the top of the barrel, headed it up and told the grocer to take it away—she should use no such flour as that. The next barrel brought was perfectly satisfactory. "Now that is something like flour," she told the family. But when she reached the bottom of the barrel she found her old flour scoop, long missing, which had been headed up in the other end. The grocer had merely brought back the same barrel with the other end uppermost.—London Exchange.

How He Got It.

Gabby—How did you get that dreadful cold?

Snuffleton—Id the datural way, stoopid! S'pose I advertised for plads ad spedificatious?—Texas Siftings.

Over the Baby.

Mrs. Montgomery Lardo has become the happy mamma of a baby boy, who is a month old when he and his mamma receive a call from six of mamma's young lady friends, who rush in a body toward the baby and go like this:

"O-o-o-o-h, the dear, sweet little darling!"

"What—a—perfect—little—beauty!"

"Bless his dear little heart!"

"Do let me take him!"

"No, let me!"

"No, me."

"Isn't he sweet?"

"He's just as cunning as ever he can be!"

"Isn't he, though?"

"He looks ever so much like you, Minnie.'

"Think so?"

"He's the living image of you!"

"His nose is a good deal like his papa's."

"What does papa think of him?"

"I should think you'd be awfully proud of him."

"I am!"

"Here, here, little manny, look at auntie!"

"B'ess his own itty s'eet baby se'f. Is he auntie's"——

"Now, do let me take him."

"No, it's my turn."

"Oh, I want him!"

"I do think he's the sweetest baby I ever saw."

"Oh, I could eat him up alive."

"See that dear, cunning little dimple!"

"Oh, must he go upstairs again? I must kiss him first."

"So must I."

"And I."

"And I."

"Me, too."

"Now it's my turn. Bye, bye, sweety!"—Z. D. in Time.

His Intention.

"And what does your pa say, Mary?" asked the young man who had requested his sweet heart to sound her father on the subject of his prospects of receiving a favorable answer to a request for the hand of the daughter.

"He says," answered the maiden, "that he will never permit me to marry a young man who stays so late when he comes here."

"Well," said the youth, "it is just as well that we understand each other at this juncture, that is, your pa and me."

"Understand each other?"

"Yes; for if he had considered my proposal favorably and you had married me, he would have been very much disappointed in me."

"Why so?"

"Why in that case I didn't intend to go home at all."—Boston Courier.

Not a Quack.

Patient (about leaving eminent physician's office)—Well, doctor, I will get this prescription filled at once, and——

Eminent Physician—Ahem! Ten dollars, please.

Patient—Eh? Do you require pay in advance?

Eminent Physician (with great dignity)—Certainly, sir. I'm not one of y'r "no cure no pay" quacks.—New York Weekly.

The Experiment Tried.

Spirited Woman (to big Plug Ugly)—Oh, if I were only a man wouldn't I teach you manners!

Celestial Voice—Your prayer is granted. You shall be a man. [Transforms her.]

Big Plug Ugly—What de ye soy?

Newly Made Man—Um—er—I was merely remarking that it was a very pleasant day.—New York Weekly.

Where It Went To.

"Have you a quarter you can give me, sir?" asked a tattered looking individual of a citizen. "My wife and children have had nothing to eat for two days."

"Oh, that won't do," replied the gentleman; "I gave you fifty cents yesterday. What did you do with that?"

"I had to buy meat for the dog."—Harper's Bazar.

An Unfortunate Man.

"I hear," said Smith, "that Robinson has met with a great many misfortunes lately."

"Misfortunes," echoed Brown, "well I should say he had. He's the most unfortunate man I ever came across. Why," he continued, "do you know that man has got a large callous on his leg from kicking himself so much."—The Jury.

He Held to the Letter of the Law.

Bad Boy (getting in a body blow)—There, take that!

Good Boy (folding his arms with a saintly expression)—No, Tommy, I will not hit you back, because I promised mother that I would never strike a playmate, but (kicking him in the stomach) how do you like that?—Life.

Congratulations Anyhow.

Book Agent—Going from books to babies, madam, that's a fine youngster. Allow me to congratulate you.

Young Woman—Sir, that baby is not mine.

Book Agent—I repeat, madam, allow me to congratulate you.—Boston Gazette.

He Knew the Barber Was Around.

Barber—Razah pull, sah!

Customer—Why, you're not shaving me?

Barber (with a gratified smile)—Oh, yes, sah; nearly fru, sah. Didn't you feel me?

Customer—Feel you! Great Governor, yes! I thought you was giving my face a shampoo.—Texas Siftings.

WOMEN AND BIRDS.

A Cruel Fashion Which is Unworthy of American Women.

Women were once taunted with their devotion to their canaries. A more serious accusation can now be brought against them. The alarming decrease of American song and shore birds has been deplored by lovers of nature for many years. It has been due in part to unavoidable causes, such as the drainage of marshes, the conversion of woodlands into farms, the destruction of forests and rapid settlement of the country; but a much larger share of the extermination of bird-life is directly attributable to feminine folly. An interesting and valuable supplement of Science discloses the magnitude of the evil and suggests legislative remedies. It is plain, however, that the friends of the birds can not hope to accomplish their purpose by means of legislation unless they can appeal successfully to public sentiment for adequate support and encouragement. Singularly enough, they must begin by declaring war upon modern fashions and enlisting the sympathies of sensible American women. Wanton and improvident as is the destruction of birds for sport, food and scientific and amateur collections, the slaughter is mainly conducted for the millinery trade.

Some of the details of this wholesale sacrifice of bird-life on the altar of fashion are of startling significance. At Cape Cod 40,000 terns have been killed in the season by a single agent of the hat trade. At Cobb's Island, on the Virginia coast, an enterprising business woman of New York has recently succeeded in filling a contract with a Paris millinery firm for 40,000 bird-skins of gulls, sea-swallows and terns, at 40 cents apiece. The demand for egret and heron plumes has extended the line of slaughter from Florida all along the Gulf coast. In Texas sportsmen receive orders from New York for the plumes of white egrets in lots of 10,000. The prairies and mountain vales of the far West are scoured for birds of small sizes and every variety of plumage, and from the Pacific coast hundreds of thousands of bird-skins are shipped annually. Nearer home the coast line of Long Island, once one of the favorite haunts of sea-birds, has been the scene of indiscriminate butchery. Terns and sea-swallows have well-nigh disappeared from the marshes between Coney Island and Fire Island, which ten years ago were their breeding-ground. At Seaford, Moriches, Greenport and many other towns the slaughter of birds for the millinery trade is a lucrative means of livelihood; and the New Jersey coast is ravaged in the most merciless manner. The land-birds suffer in the same way. Robins, gold-winged woodpeckers, humming-birds, thrushes, orioles, cedar wax-wings, blue-birds and meadow larks are shot by the thousand and the skins and plumage sent to the shops to be used in frivolous ornithological displays in female head-dress.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE HUMAN VOICE.

Its Infallible Indication of the State of a Speaker's Mind.

Nothing betrays so much as the voice save perhaps the eyes, but they can be lowered, and so far the expression hidden. In moments of emotion no skill can hide the fact of disturbed feeling, though a strong will and habit of self-control can steady the voice when else it would be failing and tremulous. Certain voices grate on the nerves and set our teeth on edge, and others are just as calming as they are irritating, quieting, or like a composing draught. A good voice, calm in tone and musical in quality, is one of the essentials for a physician—the "bedside voice," which is nothing if it is not sympathetic by constitution. Whatever its original quality may be, the orator's voice bears the unmistakable stamp of art and becomes artificiality; as such it may be admirable—telling in a crowd, impressive in address, but overwhelming and chilling at home, partially because it is always conscious and never self-forgetting. An orator's voice, with its careful intonations and accurate accent, would be as much out of place beside a sick bed as a brocaded silk for a kitchen girl. The voice is much more indicative of the state of the mind than many people know or allow. One of the first symptoms of failing brain power is indistinct and confused utterance; no idiot has a clear or melodious voice; the harsh scream of mania is proverbial, and no person of prompt and decisive thought was ever known to hesitate and stutter. A thick, loose, fluffy voice does not belong to the crisp character of mind which does the most active work, and when a keen-witted man drawls and lets his words drop instead of bringing them out in the sharp incisive way that ought to be natural to him, there is a flaw somewhere.—Chicago Sun.

Would Save Trouble.

A prominent citizen was seen digging a large hole in his front yard.

"What are you doing?" some one asked.

"Making a pond."

"What, a pond in your front yard? What do you mean?"

"I am doing it as an accommodation. It was so much trouble for the boy who carries papers to throw them in a little puddle during wet weather that I concluded to make a pond for him. He is a gentlemanly fellow, and I want to assist him all I can. This pond will save him much trouble."—Arkansas Traveler.

Where She Missed It.

Anxious Mother—Well, darling, did you have a pleasant time?

Charming Daughter—Oh! so nice. George was all attention, and we had oysters twice and terrapin and canvas-back duck. He is so liberal.

Anxious Mother (hoarsely)—Wretched girl, you have ruined your chances for life. Rather would I have heard a tale of a walk home to save car fare.—Philadelphia Call.

WHAT KILLED HIM.

The Coroner Had Long Expected It, and Knew What the Matter Was.

They had lifted the body out of the canal, and a dozen of us stood around it when the coroner came. He glanced at the face, asked who first saw the body, and then said:

"I have expected this for a year or more. Poor fellow! No inquest will be necessary."

"But isn't it a case of suicide?" asked one of the crowd.

"Certainly."

"And shouldn't you investigate the causes which drove him to the rash act?"

"I know them already. He was a clerk in a hardware store next to my office. Last summer he got charge of the refrigerator department. A hundred times did I hear him repeat:

"'A refrigerator? Certainly, ma'am; step this way, and be seated. Now, then, our Peerless refrigerator is built entirely on scientific principles. This, as you will observe, is the ice chest. The cold current passes from the ice down these air pipes to the right, circulates along the racks, passes up through those pipes to the left, and escapes out of that ventilator in the end. There is always a constant current of air, not only preserving the articles placed on the racks, but carrying the odor away. We guarantee that you may place onions and butter side by side for one week, and that one will not taste of the other. Inside this zinc lining is a layer of charcoal two inches thick. Our refrigerator is cooler with five pounds of ice than any other with twenty. The circulation is on scientific principles, as you will observe. No bellows are needed to create the current. There are no cog wheels to get out of order—no springs to give way. Actual experiments have demonstrated that there is an actual saving of 50 per cent. of ice during the season. The racks are galvanized, as you will observe, and the trimmings are of the latest and best patterns. We sold these right along last year at $18, but, having secured all the hard wood lumber in the country, and having a monopoly on the supply of ice in the United States, we have decided to reduce the price to $15.'

"Day after day for three months, and sometimes five or six times a day, he repeated this statement," said the coroner, "and I knew that it was only a question of time when the end would come. The 1st of October they changed him into the coal stove department, and then, day after day, he sang this song:

"'A base burner! Certainly, ma'am—right this way. Presume you saw our advertisement last Sunday. The climax in base burners has at last been reached. Here it is, ma'am—our Acme. Isn't it a beauty? Everything, outside of the grates and windows, made of solid nickel and warranted not to turn black. It's as handsome as a painting, and lots of people who can't afford a piano are buying these stoves simply as a parlor ornament. What would our grandfathers and grandmothers say if they could step from their graves and behold a picture like this? We have ladies come in here and ask permission to sit down and criticise the stove as a work of art, the same as they would a piece of statuary or a painting.

"And now for the interior. This is the firepot, as you will see. As soon as the combustion takes place the hot air is drawn down through these flues, passes twice around the base, ascends to radiate around the top, passes over the live fire to be reheated, and finally escapes by the flue when it has no further value as a heating power. Economical? That's our strong point, ma'am. We claim that this stove will heat four times the surface with one ton of coal that any other stove will with three. It feeds and regulates itself. Any child can run it. No gas can escape when the stove is closed. All its parts are so handy to be got at, and by no possibility can any accident occur. It lights a room so that no lamp is needed, saves enough in coal to buy all your meat and potatoes, and when not in use as a stove we have a music box to go inside of it.'

"Poor fellow!" sighed the coroner, as he bent over him in pity. "These were the songs he was compelled to sing to earn his daily bread, and we who were near him knew that the end must finally come. It has come. He did not want to live any longer, and none of us can blame him. I will turn the body over to the undertaker. The jury could only find that he died of a broken heart."—New York Sun.

A Determined Man.

The rush for seats at the Auditorium amounts to a profound sensation. Old women stand in the rain from early morning until late at night, moving inch by inch toward the box office. A well known business man took a place in the line at 6 o'clock the other morning. Along about 4 o'clock in the afternoon a board of trade man offered him five dollars for his place.

"Not much," he answered. "This position has cost me the hardest day's work I ever did, and I don't care to sell it. I haven't eaten a bite today—hastened away from home before breakfast."

At 6 o'clock he was the tenth man from the ticket window. A man offered him $10 for his place.

"Oh, no," he answered. "I would not go through again what I have gone through for twenty dollars."

At last he stepped up to the window. He stood there a moment and then swore an oath that echoed throughout the great building. He had forgotten his pocketbook.—Arkansaw Traveler.

Identified.

"Who lives in there?" asked a Somerville boy of his Sunday school teacher as they were walking by Norton's grove.

"Professor Norton," was the reply.

"Professor Norton?" repeated the boy. "Who's he?" Then a light spread over his face and he exclaimed: "Oh, I know. He keeps a barber shop down in Union square."—Somerville Journal.

A Literary Clerk.

The person who goes into the dry goods stores to buy books doesn't always find the same learned clerks that he does in a genuine book store. "Have you 'Arnold's Poems?'" asked a thin chested young man in Meldrum's yesterday. "'Arnold's Poems?'" answered the fair girl. "Let's see, Mr. Snipley, have we 'Benedict Arnold's Poems?'"—Buffalo Courier.

HOW TO PLANT VINEYARDS.

A correspondent wtiting in the Tulare Register, says: "As the question of planting out vines is now up for discussion, I will prepare a few thoughts on this subject for the consideration of your readers. Let me say that my experience in growing grapes began over thirty years ago in Sonoma county, and I have watched the business with much interest from that day to this. I only wish to make a few observations on the method of planting. Some twenty-five years ago my father planted a vineyard in rows, fifteen feet apart one way, and five feet the other, that gave about the same number of vines to the acre as planting eight feet each way which was considered the standard distance for wine grapes. I know that all of his neighbors as well as myself made sport of this odd style of planting, but twenty-five years of experience has demonstrated the wisdom of the plan. This vineyard produces fully as many tons of grapes to the acre as the adjoining vineyards, besides it can be much more cheaply handled, permitting the wagon to go behind each row, the brush to be burned on the spot, and a portion of the ground to be cultivated with a larger team. Some say Paige & Morton have adopted 6x12, with the wide rows running north and south. Now let me suggest that is a great mistake. The 6x12 is all right, but the wide rows should be east and west, for the reason that the vertical sun will get on the trays no matter which way the rows run, but to get the greatest benefit we want the morning and evening rays. Now to get this it is very obvious that the wide rows should run east and west. Then there is another advantage in this manner of planting, which is that sometimes the grapes get sunburnt, and you will always find that on the west side it is the 5 o'clock sun that gets in its work. Shining in under the vine, if your rows are set thickly east and west one vine will shade and protect the other. Now as too many or few vines to the acre; that doesn't make much difference in the yield. It is not the number of vines but the number of shoots that govern this matter. If you have more vines you leave less shoots to the vine, and vice versa. I would recommend 6x15 with the wide rows running east and west.

LATE AND EARLY FRUITS.

Frank Stevens of Ballena, the Government chemist, presented the following paper at the recent County Horticultural convention:

I wish to call attention to a peculiarity of our mount in climate that does not appear generally known. It is a well-known fact that an increase of altitude is equivalent to an increase of latitude. In other words, going up a mountain brings one into a climate that is similar to that of locations much farther north at a lower level. It is also well known that the seasons in the more southern localities are longer, and that, therefore, fruits ordinarily ripen later in southern localities than in northern, excepting, of course, those fruits and varieties native in northern localities, which, when grown in the south, follow the season of their original locality to a greater or less extent. From these two known facts one would infer that the mountain fruit would ripen at the same time those do that are grown in an equivalent climate further north at a lower altitude, which would be earlier than those grown at the foot of the mountain in the same latitude. Experience proves the contrary, however.

There is a difference of ten to fifteen days in the ripening of the same varieties of peaches grown in the mountains at, say, Ballena, thirty miles northeast, and 2,000 feet higher in altitude, the mountain fruit being the later.

In peaches there is a gap of a few days between the ripening of the early and the late classes, during which time the fruit dealers find it difficult to supply their customers. Now, we mountain fruit-growers can fill that gap, as our Fosters and early Crawfords are just in their prime when the markets are nearly bare and the demand is good. It is usually considered that the early fruits are the most profitable, if they can be easily marketed, but often the extra late proves quite as profitable and is usually more to be depended on. In marketing extra early fruit a delay of two or three days may cause a loss of all the profit, while a delay in marketing the late fruit but adds to its value, provided the fruit keeps in good condition.

In grapes we will find this later ripening in the mountains a source of profit, provided we plant the right varieties. It will not pay us to plant raisin varieties, as our early rains make it difficult to sun-dry raisins, but I believe our high-colored and fine-flavored Flame Tokays and similar varieties will prove very profitable when we get convenient railroad facilities, which are likely to be ready before our vineyards are in full bearing.—San Diego Union.

Raisins are good eating and the world has never yet had enough of them, but they have a fault, a grievous fault, as one is persuaded who unsuspectingly brings his molars down upon a seed found in his Christmas pie. The inventor who will either provide an inexpensive machine for stoning raisins, or grows a superior stoneless raisin, will be a benefactor of his kind, and womankind in particular, for stoning raisins is about as tedious a business as ever fell to woman's lot. The Fresno papers are just now discussing this matter and seem to think that the long-looked-for seedless raisin may have been found. The seedless Sultana has many friends and always will have, but the berry is small and the flavor suits it better for use as a currant than as a raisin for general purposes. It is not at all probable that any seedless grape will be found that will take the place of the Muscatel, for there are many uses which it fills to perfection, but a large and sweet seedless grape will nevertheless be a boom to the world.

The Fresno papers, in connection with this discussion, have had considerable to say of what they call the Thompson seedless grape. Not much is known of it, but what is known is in its favor. It is a much larger grape than the Sultana, looks more like a currant than a raisin and is a very heavy bearer. The chief objection to the Sultana is that it ripens very late. If this new variety ripens early enough to escape our fall rains it will come into immediate favor. Meantime proceed with your stoning machines, O, ye inventors! That way fortune lies.—Tulare Register.

NOTES OF INTEREST.

The coming Riverside orange crop is estimated at 1300 carloads. Last year it was 827 carloads.

Much San Francisco and English capital has been invested in the olive orchards of Santa Ynez valley, Santa Barbara county.

W. H. Noaler of Del Mar has successfully experimented with sorghum cane on a ten-acre tract, the syrup being pronounced superb.—[San Diego Sun.

One of T. H. Thomas' threshing machines made a record of 1248 sacks of grain in one day. The operators are striving to thresh 1500 sacks on one run. The late rain is making some delay.—[Phœnix (A. T.) Herald.

E. T. Palmer has shipped over 50,000 pounds of fruit to Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, San Diego and California points this season, and his shipping is not completed yet. This does not include oranges.—[Pomona Times.

A Southern California farmer has recently gathered thirty-six potatoes from a single vine. The late Dr. Chanpin, ex-vice-president of the State Board of Horticulture, had a volunteer vine on his Santa Barbara county ranch that yielded sixty well-grown potatoes.

Seven corn-talks have been brought us from the Chino ranch. Three of them are nine feet and two inches high, two are seven feet and four inches high, and two of them are over seven feet high. Perhaps our Eastern readers will put this down as another California yarn.—[Pomona Progress.

A San Jose gentleman thus describes honey dew: "It is produced by certain insects which live upon the limbs and leaves of trees, and seems to be a sort of exudation from the bodies of the insects. The insects are certain kinds of aphis which live upon leaves and suck the sap and also certain kinds of scale insects, lecaniums, which, while young, live upon the leaves, but upon the newest growth later in the season. A kind of fungus sometimes takes root in this honey dew, and the leaves and other parts of the tree become sooty black from its growth."

GRAPES AND RAISINS.

A Bright Outlook for the California Viticulturist.

(Fresno Expositor.)

The New York Fruit Trade Journal in a late issue says there is a largely increased demand for California raisins in the East. Such reports will come to us from year to year as our raisin-makers learn to make a uniformity good article and pack them in an attractive style.

This is a business wherein there can be no competition with California west of the Atlantic ocean. With reasonable reductions on the freight East there is no reason why California raisin-growers could not reach over into Europe for their trade. There is only two things in the way of this now—high freights and the difference in the value of labor. This last can be overcome by families utilizing the services of all their members a short time during the year while picking and drying their crops.

What more pleasant, healthful and profitable employment can families engage in than the cultivation, picking, packing and shipping of table grapes, or the drying and packing of raisins? Almost any ordinary family can handle the product of ten acres of grapes. Let us see the income which might be derived from ten acres of mature Muscat grapes. If properly tilled and pruned, when five years old the yield should be five tons to the acre. Every year afterward the yield will increase. Muscat grapes for table use can always be sold at $20 and upward per ton. This brings in at the fifth year an income of $1,000 and more for a few months' work of the family. If freights are reduced so that these and other table grapes could be sold at retail throughout the central part of the country at 4 or 5 cents, the demand would become practically illimitable. Now, when our transmountain friends want good California table grapes they have to pay from 15 cents upward per pound. At the lower figure mentioned above they would be on every poor man's table, instead of being the luxury of the rich alone.

The making of raisins is still more profitable, besides being a convenient method of preserving any surplus product above the immediate demand for the table. Carefully dried and packed raisins will no doubt produce to the raiser at least $200 per acre, and more as the vines increase in age. In what country under the sun outside of California can there be any crop raised more profitable than a table grape or raisin crop? The wine men have made a huge mistake in combining against the poor producer. They can and will graft their wine stocks with table and raisin grapes, and then the demand for our wines cannot be met. We doubt if there has ever been a time when good wine grapes should not have brought from $20 to $25 a ton. They did bring that when our wine industry was young and before any reputation and demand for them had been created. Now that California wines are being appreciated without being covered with lying French labels, certainly good wine grapes should be worth more than then. Yet the wine dealers have evidently combined to grab all the profits. The result will be that those having wine vineyards will graft them into raisin varieties and leave these wine cormorants out in the cold with their vaults empty.

SAN JOSE SCALE REMEDY.

The time has arrived for the application of washes that cannot be applied when the foliage is on the trees. The following, Cornell's formula for the destruction of the San Jose scale, has been successfully used throughout the State: 50 pounds best quality unslacked lime; 20 pounds sulphur; 15 pounds common stock salt; 60 gallons water.

Boil 10 pounds of lime and 20 pounds of sulphur in 20 gallons of water for half an hour or more, or until both lime and sulphur are dissolved. The sulphur must be thoroughly dissolved and mixed with the lime. The mixture will then be of an amber color. Then slack in an empty half barrel 40 pounds of the best quality of lime with soft, hot water, using enough water to thoroughly slacken the lime and keep it in a liquid form. After the lime is slacked add 15 pounds of common stock salt while the material is still hot.

When the salt is well dissolved, mix the two lots together with sufficient water to make 60 gallons of spraying material, which will then be like a thin whitewash. The material should be strained after being thoroughly mixed—a piece of burlap answering well for the purpose.

Apply the wash milk-warm or warmer, with a spray pump, using a nozzle that does not clog.

HEALTH.

Happiness Depending Almost Entirely on Condition of Body and Mind.

According to our views of life, health is the most desirable thing that appertains to this present life. We so believe because man was created to enjoy himself, and please his Creator. If this were not so we should be obliged to charge Deity with imperfection, in that He had no settled object in the creation of man. Man's mental and physical constitutions in connection with the vast creations around him, their power to give happiness to man, is in proof that man was created for his own pleasure on earth, as well as for the pleasure of his Creator. Now as happiness in life depends almost entirely on the health of the body and mind, it behooves us to inquire what are the peculiar conditions which will best promote physical and mental health. Physical health depends on various circumstances, as the food we eat, as to its quality and quantity; the exposure we endure as to heat and cold; the exposure to miasmata, or to the spores of vegetable or animal life which lodge in the mucus membranes, are taken into the circulation and multiply to such an extent as to endanger and often destroy life. If when young the stomach is given double the work that it is able to do, it is plain that functional derangement must ensue, and if persisted in, disease, disorganization and death must follow. If we expose ourselves to the miasmatic exhalations of swamps and sluggish streams, we are pretty sure to suffer the pains of fever and ague, remittent or typhoid fevers. If we imprudently expose ourselves to intense cold or wet too long, we are in danger of acute inflammations in those organs most exposed or from weakness the most liable to take on disease. It is through the careful study of the causes and effects as applicable to the human organization that knowledge is to be acquired which can be made available in the preservation of health. The action of foreign bodies on the system taken into the stomach, must be studied with care, and this through anatomy and physiology of the organs of the body. The original intention of the Creator, as related to the functions and powers of the body, must be studied in connection with those things both physical and mental which produce an effect on them. The experience of ages condensed in book form, and our own critical observations added thereto, are what we have to depend on as a guide in the education of each and every organ of the whole system.

The nice point in this education is in giving just enough of legitimate food to each organ, so that the aggregated whole shall be in harmony with itself and all its surroundings. If the thing is over-done bad results show themselves, as for instance, if we teach alimentiveness to gobble all within reach, dyspepsia or inflammation will follow attended with suffering—if acquisitiveness is falsely educated, the person is little, stingy and is very apt to be tempted to theft or other crime to gratify its greed for gold—if veneration is over-educated, the person neglects his business, squanders his money, becomes deranged, and often such estrangement of mind leads to suicide. Every organ of the brain is liable to be falsely educated, as well as to be wrongfully neglected. In either case difficulty comes—effects follow that curtail more or less the happiness of the person, and hence it is evident, that to make the most perfect man requires a harmonious education of the whole. We are too apt to go to extremes, so much so that many of the faculties are sadly neglected.

As a sample take the profession of law. The lawyer is educated to make the worse appear the better cause. He is taught that next to his own financial interests are the interests of his clients. A murderer arraigned for trial is bound to be cleared if the lawyer can do it. It matters not what the means used; though his lawyer knows that his client is guilty yet he uses all his finesse, all his duplicity, all the false logic he can command to turn the guilty one loose, to again imbrue his hands in blood. And this exclusive and specific education of lawyers is what has cursed this country with unholy laws and forged chains for the people. It is almost self-evident that man's happiness individually and collectively hinges on the kind and degree of education given and whether it be confined to few organs, or evenly and appropriately distributed to all. Mothers, please do not try to make precocious intellects or to educate any given group of organs to the exclusion of the rest. Give a general diffused and rational education to all the organs of mind and you will have done a great favor to the child and a duty to yourself and the world.—R. K. Slosson, in Western Rural.

Mineral Waters.

It is remarkable how the taste for natural and artificial mineral waters has grown in the last fifteen years. Well-to-do people rarely drink plain water. They have been led to prefer mineral or aerated drinks. It is questionable whether it is wise to introduce into the system the salts, sodas and long list of minerals which are held in solution in these naturally prepared waters. Some of them act powerfully on various parts of the system. News comes that there is a new water, prepared in Paris, that does not seem to be open to any objection, for it is simply distilled water charged with oxygen. Nine-tenths of the water used for drinking contains substances in solution deleterious to the human system. Nevertheless diseases result from the use of ordinary water. If distilled, however, and kept from the air, the fluid thus obtained is innocuous. This, added to oxygen, ought, on general principles, to be wholesome, but those who can not get this gas would do well to distill, or at least boil, all the water they drink; but no mineral water should be partaken of unless under the advice of a physician.—Demorest's Monthly.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21 1890

DIED.

ALBERS—At Georges Creek, February 20th, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Albers, aged 3 months.

W. T. Grant Esq. has been in town during the week.

Matt McDonald came in from Darwin on Tuesday's train.

Silas Reynolds came down from Bishop on Monday's train.

The lawyers of Nevada are endeavoring to organize a bar association.

Hing, the Chinese murderer, was hung in San Francisco last Friday.

A. R. Conklin Esq. and Alvah Conklin started for Mojave on Wednesday morning.

Melone & Fuller are taking out free milling gold ore at Coyoteville, west of Big Pine.

J. D. Shaw has erected a new building 18x36 feet on his location under the Big Pine canal.

Mr. A. Davidson left Inependence on Wednesday morning for Mojave and thence to New York.

Miss Mary Malholland arrived home from Los Angeles yesterday. Her health is much improved.

The Board of Education was in session during the week. There were no applicants for examination.

School Superintendent Shannon has been visiting the schools in the southern end of the valley during the week.

Mrs. McCall and her daughter, Mrs. S. Decker, have both been very ill at their home at Lone Pine during the past week.

A fine horse belonging to the Eastside Canal Co. died a few days ago from eating wet alfalfa. The storm and flood caused a hay famine at the camp and this led to the death of the animal.

Nearly all the sheep in western Nye county, Nevada, perished in the recent big snow. Messrs. Toole, Hubbard and Hogan are loosers to the amount of 19,000 head.

Crit. Hampton came in from Lookout on Tusday morning and will remain in town a while to recover from an attack of lead poisoning. He says that both Gunn and Fitzgerald are doing very well.

There are five teams engaged in hauling borax from the works in Saline Valley to the railroad; two belonging to Schober and one each to Marshall, Hall and Smith. They have been hung up during the past week because of snow.

An artesian well at Mojave is now down about eleven hundred feet. A stratum of rock is now being bored through and it is expected that flowing water will be found under it. At a depth of less than two hundred feet good water was found but it would not rise high enough to flow.

Johnny Johnson, the oldest son of Mrs. W. K. Miller of Lone Pine had his skull fractured by a fall from a horse over a year ago. Dr. Woodin was called and the boy appeared to be completely cured. Recently he complained of severe pains in the head and he died last Friday from the effects of his terrible hurt.

D. Crough came down from Big Pine last Monday to attend the meeting of the Board of Education. The new school house at Big Pine has been completed by the addition of a fine bell, the gift of the ladies of the district. Mr. Crough has an attendance of 53 pupils and reports good progress.

Mr. Horace Bellows has a party of Indians shearing his Angora goats at Rose Spring. There are several thousand goats in the band and their fleeces are of fine quality, the mohair being as white as snow and fine as silk. The clip will yield several thousand pounds of mohair. All of this material goes to New York, there being no factory for its manufacture on the Pacific Coast. Mr. Bellows has imported many of the best bred of these animals and his herd has been bred up for several years till his goats yield a fleece that is first-class and commands the highest price in the market.

Argus Range Mines.

Frank Bennett, an old time prospector, has located fifty-three mining claims in the Argus Range in the neighborhood of the Haggin mine and the Riley mill. Last Sunday he went into Mojave with a wagon load of samples of ore from fifteen of the claims. The ore was sent to San Francisco to be worked for a test. Recently several parties from Los Angeles went to the district with Bennett and examined the claims. He bonded several of the mines to these parties. He says these men will put up a mill at a point convenient to the mines and will give miners a privilege to work any of the claims for a term of two or three years and the miners have the entire proceeds for developing the mines. Bennett says men who will work can make good wages from the start. The business men of Los Angeles appear very willing and anxious to help develop the mining resources of Inyo county.

Some Fine Stallions.

Inyo county can boast of as well bred horses as can be found anywhere. Albenton, by Gen. Benton was bred at Palo Alto and is a brother to Lord Byron, 2:18 at three years, Sallie Benton, 2:17¾ at four years, and to the dam of Sunol, 2:10¼ at three years. A three-year-old by Fallis, 2:24, by Electioneer, out of a mare by McClellan's Duke. Both of these fine stallions are owned by W. S. Enos, of Independence. Antare, a three-year-old by Anteros by Electioneer out of a Bishaw mare is owned by Holbert & Smith and will make the season at Bishop. The Conklin brothers have recently purchased a three-year-old stallion by Mt. Vernon by Nutwood, sire of Woodnut, who won the great stallion stakes at Sacramento a year ago, defeating Guy Wilkes and Stamboul. The colt is registered as a standard trotter under the name of Mt. Vernon Prince. There are three thoroughbreds; Little Jack out of Lucy Dale by Budd Doble by Norfolk, owned by H. Giles, of Independence. Bronco, by Joe Hooker by Monday, owned by Barney Peeler of Bishop, and Pickpocked by Joe Daniels, owned by Holbert & Smith. These young stallions combine the best trotting and running blood to be found in the State. A full description of each of these stallions will be published in a future edition.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

"Yes, sir, that's it; and that's what he wants to see you about."

"More money, I suppose," said Mr. Quest.

"Well, yes, sir. You see there will be the covenants to meet, and then the farm is three hundred acres, and to stock it proper means nine pounds an acre quite, on this here heavy land."

"What is it that brings you to Boisingham?"

"Yes, yes, I know; a matter of four thousand more or less; but where is it to come from? that's the question. Cossey's do not like land now any more than other banks do. However, I'll see my principal about it. But, George, I can't possibly get up to the castle at 11. I have got a churchwarden's meeting at a quarter to—about that west pinnacle, you know. It is in a most dangerous condition; and, by the way, before you go I should like to have your opinion, as a practical man, as to the best way to deal with it. To rebuild it would cost a hundred and twenty pounds, and that is more than we see our way to pay at present, though I can promise fifty, if they can scrape up the rest. But about the squire. I think that the best thing I can do will be to come up to the castle to lunch, and then I can talk over matters with him. Stay, I will just write him a note. By the way, you would like a glass of wine, wouldn't you, George? Nonsense, man, here it is in the cupboard; a glass of wine is a good friend to have handy sometimes."

George, who, like most men of his stamp, could put away his share of liquor and feel thankful for it, drank his glass of wine while Mr. Quest was engaged in writing his note, wondering meanwhile what made the lawyer so civil to him. For George did not like Mr. Quest. Indeed, it would not be too much to say that he hated him. But this was a feeling that he never allowed to appear; he was too much afraid of the man for that, and in his queer way too much devoted to the old squire's interests to run the risk of imperilling them by the exhibition of any aversion to Mr. Quest. He knew more of his master's affairs than anybody living, unless it was, perhaps, Mr. Quest himself, and was aware that the lawyer held the old gentleman in a bondage that could not be broken. Now George was a man with faults. He was somewhat sly, and, perhaps, within certain lines, at times capable of giving the word honesty a liberal interpretation. But among many others he had one conspicuous virtue; he loved the old squire as a Highlandman loves his chief, and would almost, if not quite, have died to serve him. Indeed, as it was, his billet was no easy one, for Mr. de la Molle's temper was none of the best at times; and when things went wrong, as they pretty frequently did, he was exceedingly apt to visit his wrath on the head of the devoted George, saying things to him which he should not have said. But his retainer took it all in the day's work, and never bore malice, continuing in his own cadging, pig headed sort of way to labor early and late to prop up his master's broken fortunes. Indeed, had it not been for George's contrivings and procrastinations, Honham Castle and its owner would have parted company long before.

CHAPTER VII.

EDWARD COSSEY, ESQ.

After George had drunk his glass of wine and given his opinion as to the best way to deal with the dangerous pinnacle on the Boisingham church, he took the note, untied the fat pony and rambled off back to Honham, leaving the lawyer alone. As soon as he was gone Mr. Quest threw himself back in his chair—an old oak one, by the way, for he had a very pretty taste in antiquities and a positive mania for collecting them—and plunged into a brown study.

Presently he leaned forward, unlocked the top drawer of his writing table and extracted from it a letter addressed to himself, which he had received that very morning. It was from the principals of the great banking firm of Cossey & Son, and dated from their head office in Mincing lane. This letter ran as follows:

[Private and confidential.]

"DEAR SIR—We have considered your report as to the extensive mortgages which we hold upon the Honham Castle estates, and have given due weight to your arguments as to the advisability of allowing Mr. de la Molle time to give things a chance of righting. But we must tell you that we can see no prospect of any such solution of the matter, at any rate for some years to come. All the information that we are able to gather points to a further decrease in the value of land rather than to a recovery. The interest on the mortgages in question is moreover a year in arrear, probably owing to the non-receipt of rents by Mr. de la Molle. Under these circumstances, much as it grieves us to take action against Mr. de la Molle, with whom family we have had dealings for five generations, we can see no alternative but foreclosure, and hereby instruct you to take the necessary preliminary steps to bring it about in the usual manner. We are, presuming that Mr. de la Molle is not in a position to pay off the mortgages, quite aware of the risks of a forced sale, and shall not be astonished if, in the present unprecedented condition of the land market, such a sale should result in a loss, although the sum recoverable does not amount to half the valuation of the estates, which was undertaken at our instance about twenty years ago, on the occasion of the first advance. The only alternative, however, would be for us to enter into possession of the property or to buy it in. But this would be a course totally inconsistent with the usual practice of the bank, and, what is more, our confidence in the stability of landed property is so utterly shattered by our recent experiences that we can not burden ourselves by such a course, preferring to run the risk of an immediate loss, which, however, we hope that the historical character of the property and its great natural advantages as a residential estate will avert, or at the least minimize.

"Be so good as to advise us by an early post of the steps you take in pursuance of these instructions.

"We are, dear sir, your obedient servants,
"COSSEY & SON.

"W. Quest, Esq.

"P. S.—We have thought it better to address you direct in this matter, but of course you will communicate the contents of this letter to Mr. Edward Cossey, and, subject to our instructions, which are final, act in consultation with him."

"Well," said Mr. Quest to himself, as he folded up the sheet of paper, "that is about as straight as it can be put. And this is the time that the old gentleman chooses to ask for another four thousand. He may ask, but the answer will be more than he bargains for."

He rose from the chair and began to walk up and down the room in evident perplexity. "If only," he said, "I had twenty-five thousand I would take up the mortgages myself and foreclose at my leisure. It would be a good investment at that figure, even as things are, and besides, I should like to have that place. Twenty-five thousand, only twenty thousand, and now when I want it I have not got it. And I should have had it if it had not been for that tiger, that devil Edith. She has had more than that out of me in the last ten years, and still she is threatening and crying for more, more, more. Tiger—yes, that is the name for her; her own name, too. She would coin one's vitals into money if she could. All Belle's fortune she has had, or nearly all, and most of my savings, and now she wants another five hundred, and she will have it, too. Here we are," and he drew a letter from his pocket written in a bold but somewhat uneducated woman's hand.

"Dear Bill" it ran—"I've been unlucky again and dropped a pot. Shall want £500 by the 1st October. No shuffling, mind; money down; but I think that you know me too well to play any more larks. When can you tear yourself from the lovely Mrs. Q——, and come and give your E—— a look? Bring some tin when you come, and we will have times. Thine, THE TIGER."

"The Tiger, yes, the Tiger," he gasped, his face working with passion and his gray eyes glinting as he tore the epistle to fragments, and threw them down and stamped on them.

"Well, be careful that I don't one day cut your claws and paint your stripes. By heaven! it ever a man felt like murder I do now. Five hundred more, and I haven't five thousand clear in the world. Truly we pay for the follies of our youth! It makes me mad to think of those fools Cossey & Son forcing that place into the market just now. There's a fortune in it at the price. In another year or two I might have recovered myself that devil of a woman might be dead—and I have several irons in the fire, some of which would be sure to turn up trumps. Surely there must be a way out of it somehow. There's a way out of everything except death if only one thinks enough, but the thing is to find it," and he stopped in his walk opposite to the window that looked upon the street and put his hand to his head.

As he did so he caught sight of the figure of a tall gentleman strolling idly toward the office door. For a moment he stared at him blankly, as a man does when he is trying to catch the vague clew to a new idea. Then, as the figure passed out of his view, he brought his fist down heavily upon the sill.

"Edward Cossey, by George!" he said, aloud. "There's the way of it, if only I can work him, and unless I have made a strange mistake I think I know the way."

A couple of minutes afterward a tall, shapely young man of about twenty-four or five years of age, came strolling into the office where Mr. Quest was sitting, to all appearance hard at work at his correspondence. He was dark in complexion and decidedly distinguished looking in feature, with large, dark eyes, dark mustaches and a pale, somewhat Spanish looking skin. Young as the face was, it had, if observed closely, a somewhat worn and worried air, such as one would scarcely expect to see upon the countenance of a gentleman born to such brilliant fortunes, and so well fitted by nature to do them justice, as was Mr. Edward Cossey. For it is not every young man with dark eyes and a good figure who is destined to be the future head of one of the most wealthy private banks in England, and to inherit in due course a sum of money in hard cash variously estimated at from half a million to a million sterling. Such, however, was the prospect in life that opened out before Mr. Edward Cossey, who was now supposed by his old and eminently business like father to be in process of acquiring a sound knowledge of the provincial affairs of their house by attending to the working of their country branches in the eastern counties.

"How do you do, Quest?" said Edward Cossey, nodding somewhat coldly to the lawyer and sitting down. "Any business?"

"Well, yes, Mr. Cossey," answered the lawyer, rising respectfully, "there is some business, some very serious business."

"Indeed," said Edward, indifferently, "what is it?"

"Well, it is this: the house has ordered a foreclosure on the Honham castle estates—at least it comes to that."

At the sound of this intelligence Edward Cossey's whole demeanor underwent the most startling transformation—his languor vanished, his eyes brightened, and his form became instinct with active life and beauty.

"What the deuce," he said, and then paused. "I won't have it," he went on, jumping up, "I won't have it! I am not particularly fond of old De la Molle, perhaps because he is not particularly fond of me," he added, rather drolly; "but it would be an infernal shame to break up that family and sell the house under them. Why, they would be ruined. And then there's Ida—Miss de la Molle, I mean—what would become of her? And the old place, too. After being in the family for all these centuries, I suppose it would be sold to some confounded counter skipper or some retired thief of a lawyer. It must be prevented at any price—do you hear, Quest?"

The lawyer winced a little at his chief's contemptuous allusion, and then remarked, with a smile: "I had no idea that you were so sentimental, Mr. Cossey, or that you took a lively interest in Miss de la Molle," and he glanced up to observe the effect of his shot.

Edward Cossey colored. "I did not mean that I took any particular interest in Miss de la Molle," he said, "I was referring to the family."

"Oh, quite so, though I am sure I don't know why you shouldn't. Miss de la Molle is one of the most charming women that I ever met, I think the most charming, if I except my own wife Belle," and he again looked up suddenly at Edward Cossey, who, for his part, colored for the second time. "It seems to me," went on the lawyer, "that a man in your position has a most splendid opportunity of playing knight errant to the lovely damsel in distress. Here is the lady with her aged father about to be sold up and turned out of the estates which have belonged to her family for generations—why don't you do the generous and graceful thing, like the hero in a novel, and take up the mortgages?"

Edward Cossey did not reject this suggestion with the contempt that might have been expected; on the contrary, he appeared to be turning the matter over in his mind, for he drummed a little tune with his knuckles and stared out of the window.

"What is the sum?" said he, presently.

"Five-and-twenty thousand, and he wants four more, say thirty thousand."

"And where am I going to find thirty thousand pounds to take up a bundle of mortgages which will probably never pay a farthing of interest? Why, I have not got three thousand I can come at. Besides," he added, recollecting himself, "why should I interfere in it?"

"I do not think," answered Mr. Quest, ignoring the latter part of the question, "that with your prospects you would find it difficult to get thirty thousand or twice thirty thousand pounds. I know several who would consider it an honor to lend the money to a Cossey, if only for the sake of the introduction—that is, of course, provided the security was of a legal nature."

"Let me see the letter," said Edward.

Mr. Quest handed him the document conveying the commands of Cossey & Son, and he read it through twice.

"The old man means business," he said, as he returned it; "that letter was written by him, and when he has once made up his mind it is useless to try and stir him. Did you say that you were going to see the squire today?"

"No, I did not say so, but as a matter of fact I am. His man, George—a shrewd fellow, by the way, for one of these bumpkins—came with a letter asking me to go up to the castle, so I shall get round there to lunch. It is about this fresh loan that the old gentleman wishes to negotiate. Of course I shall be obliged to tell him that instead of giving a fresh loan we shall have to serve a notice on him."

"Don't do that just yet," said Edward, with decision. "Write to the house and say that their instructions shall be attended to. There is no hurry about the notice, though I don't see how I am to help in the matter. Indeed there is no call upon me."

"Very well, Mr. Cossey. And now, by the way, are you going to the castle this afternoon?"

"Yes, I believe so. Why?"

"Well, I want to get up there to luncheon, and I am in a fix. Belle will want the trap to go there this afternoon. Can you lend me your dog cart to drive up, and then perhaps you would not mind if she gave you a lift this afternoon."

"Very well," assented Edward, "that is if it suits Mrs. Quest. Perhaps she may object to carting me about the country?"

"I have not observed any such reluctance on her part," said the lawyer dryly, "but we can easily settle the question. I must go home to get some plans before I attend the vestry meeting about that pinnacle. Will you step across with me and we can ask her?"

"Oh, yes," he answered. "I have nothing particular to do."

And accordingly, as soon as Mr. Quest had made some small arrangements and given particular directions to his clerks as to his whereabouts for the day, they set off together for the lawyer's private house.

CHAPTER VIII.

MR. QUEST'S WIFE.

Mr. Quest lived in one of those snug but comfortably built old red brick houses, which abound in almost every country town, and which give us the clearest possible idea of the want of taste and love of material comfort that characterized the gross age in which they were built. This house looked out on to the market place, and had a charming old walled garden at the back, famous for its nectarines, which, together with the lawn tennis court, was, as Mrs. Quest would say, almost enough to console her for living in a town. The front door, however, was only separated by a little flight of steps from the pavement, upon which the house abutted.

Entering into a large, cool looking hall, Mr. Quest paused, and asked a servant who was passing where her mistress was.

"In the drawing room, sir," said the girl; and followed by Edward Cossey, he made his way down a long paneled passage till he reached a door on the left, which he opened quickly, and passed through into a charming, modern looking room, handsomely and even luxuriously furnished, and lighted by French windows opening on to the walled garden.

A little lady dressed in some black material was standing at one of these windows, her arms crossed behind her back, and absently gazing out of it. At the sound of the opening door she turned swiftly, her whole delicate and lovely face lighting up like a flower in a ray of sunshine, the lips slightly parted, and a deep and happy light shining in her violet eyes. Then, all in an instant, it was instructive to observe how instantaneously her glance fell upon her husband (for the lady was Mrs. Quest) and her entire expression changed to one of cold aversion, the light fading out of her face as it does from a November sky, and leaving it cold and hard.

Mr. Quest, who was a man who saw everything, saw this also, and smiled bitterly.

"Don't be alarmed, Belle," he said, in a low voice; "I have brought Mr. Cossey with me."

She flushed up to the eyes, a great wave of color, and her breast heaved; but before she could answer, Edward Cossey, who had stopped behind to wipe some mud off his shoes, entered the room, and politely offered his hand to Mrs. Quest, who took it coldly enough.

"You are an early visitor, Mr. Cossey," she said.

"Yes," said her husband, "but the fault is mine. I have brought Mr. Cossey over to ask you if you can give him a lift up to the castle this afternoon. I have to go up there to lunch, and have borrowed his dog cart."

"Oh, yes, with pleasure. But why can't the dog cart come back for Mr. Cossey?"

"Well, you see," put in Edward, "there is a little difficulty; my groom is sick. But there is really no reason why you should be bothered. I have no doubt that a man can be found to bring it back."

"Oh, no," she said, with a shrug, "it will be all right; only you had better lunch here, that's all, because I want to start early, and go to an old woman's at the other end of Honham about some fuchsia cuttings."

"I shall be very happy," said he.

"Very well, then, that is settled," said Mr. Quest, "and now I must get my plans and be off to that vestry meeting. I'm late as it is. With your permission, Mr. Cossey, I will order the dog cart as I pass your rooms."

"Certainly," said Edward, and in another moment the lawyer was gone.

Mrs. Quest watched the door close, and then sat down in a low armchair, and resting her head upon the back, looked up with a steady, inquiring gaze full into Edward Cossey's face.

And he too looked at her, and thought what a beautiful woman she was, in her own way. She was very small, rounded in her figure almost to stoutness, and possessed the tiniest and most beautiful hands and feet. But her greatest charm lay in the face, which was almost infantile in its shape, and delicate as a moss rose. She was exquisitely fair in coloring—indeed, the darkest things about her were her violet eyes, which in some lights looked almost black in contrast with her white forehead and waving auburn hair.

Presently she spoke.

"Has my husband gone?" she said.

"I suppose so. Why do you ask?"

"Because, from what I know of his habits, I should think it very likely that he is listening behind the door," and she laughed faintly.

"You seem to have a good opinion of him."

"I have exactly the opinion of him that he deserves," she said, bitterly; "and my opinion of him is that he is one of the wickedest men in England."

"If he is behind the door he will enjoy that," said Edward Cossey. "Well, if he is all this, why did you marry him?"

"Why did I marry him?" she answered, with passion. "Because I was forced into it, bullied into it, starved into it. What would you do if you were a defenseless, motherless girl of 18, with a drunken father who beat you—yes, beat you with a stick—apologized in the most gentleman-like way next morning, and then went and got drunk again? And what would you do if that father were in the hands of a man like my husband, body and soul in his hands, and if between them pressure was brought to bear and brought to bear until at last— There, what is the good of going on with it; you can guess the rest."

"Well, and what did he marry you for—your pretty face?"

"I don't know; he said so; it may have had something to do with it. I think it was my £10,000, for once I had a whole £10,000 of my own. My poor mother left it me, and it was tied up so that my father could not touch it. Well, of course, when I married my husband would not have any settlements, and so he took it, every farthing."

"And what did he do with it?"

"Spent it upon some other woman in London—most of it. I found him out; he gave her thousands of pounds at once."

"Well, I should not have thought that of him," said he, with a laugh.

She paused a moment and covered her face with her hand, and then went on: "If you only knew, Edward; if you had the faintest idea what my life was till a year and a half ago, when I first saw you, you would pity me and understand why I am bad, and passionate, and jealous, and everything that I ought not to be. I never had any happiness as a girl; how could I in such a home as ours? And then almost before I was a woman I was handed over to that man. Oh, how I hated him, and what I endured!"

KISSED ANOTHER MAN'S WIFE.

"You scoundrel," yelled young Jacob Green,
At his good neighbor, Brown,—
"You kissed my wife upon the street,—
I ought to knock you down."
"That's where you're wrong," good Brown replied,
In accents mild and meek;
"I kissed her, that I've not denied,
But kissed her on the cheek—
and I did it because she looked so handsome—the very picture of beauty and health. What is the secret of it?" "Well," replied Green, "since you ask it, I will tell you: she uses Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. I accept your apology. Good night." "Favorite Prescription" is the only remedy for the delicate derangements and weaknesses of females, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee of giving satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it returned.

WOODSON'S WEAL.

A Memphis Young Man of Worth Becomes Luckily More So.

Upon the principle that none but eagles soar with eagles, the Appeal reportorial capitalists yesterday sought out Mr. Chas. E. Woodson, the extent of whose good fortune is only excelled by his handsome appearance. Mr. Woodson was the lucky holder of a one-fortieth part of ticket No. 98,455 in the December drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery which drew the capital prize of $600,000. The Appeal commissioner found Mr. Woodson hard at work at his desk, holding the responsible position of head bookkeeper and chief of the business office of the well known retail dry goods establishment of Hunter Brothers, corner of Main and West Court Streets. He is a gentleman of fine appearance and, apparently, a genial, sociable companion. The Appeal reporter approached him with the figurative question: "Well, Mr. Woodson, I suppose your ship has come in?" "How is that, sir?" said he, and then, as if catching on to the idea, continued: "Oh, yes, sir; I made the riffle the last drawing." In reply to further interrogatories, Mr. Woodson elaborated: "I held the lucky number, deposited it with my bank, received the returns ($15,000) promptly, and have not yet decided what investment I will make. I own a valuable farm which has been receiving my attention very closely, and I may place a portion of it there in the way of improvements. I have received any amount of advice as to how I shall invest it, but I have decided to resign my place here on the 1st of January and devote a good part of next year to travel over the United States, and perhaps may go to Europe. I am a native-born West Tennesseean, Fayette County being the place of my birth and early training. I received a good literary education, which was completed at Lexington, Ky., but studied book-keeping at Leddon's Commercial College in Memphis. I have held responsible positions at Menken's and the house I am now engaged in. I have been in the habit the past five or six years of buying one or more Louisiana State Lottery tickets more as a pastime than anything else. You may rest assured I was surprised to discover that I had secured the lucky number. I will still continue to patronize the lottery in about the same way. I am thirty years of age, have been married, and have two sons who now reside at my farm. Good-bye sir."—Memphis (Tenn.) Appeal, December 28.

THE GRAVE GETS TIRED YAWNING,

Seemingly, for certain wretched invalids who toddle feebly along, though always looking as if they were going to die, but omitting to do it. They dry up, wither, dwindle away finally, but in the mean time never having robust health, know nothing of the physical enjoyment, the zest of that existence to which they cling with such remarkable tenacity. They are always to be found trying to mend by tinkering at themselves with some trashy remedy, tonic or "pick me up" to give a fillip to digestion, or "help the liver." If such misguided folks would resort and adhere to Hostetter's Stomach Bitters it would be well with them. This superb invigorant supplies the stamina that the feeble require, by permanently reinforcing digestion and assimilation. It overcomes nervousness, insomnia, malaria, kidney complaints, biliousness, constipation, rheumatism and neuralgia.

STONE IN THE KIDNEY.

I was first taken with sharp pains in the lower part of my bowels in the region of the bladder. Shortly blood appeared mixed with my urine, and a few weeks later I had an attack of gravel, I tried a number of doctors. One said it was gravel, another inflammation of the bladder, and another stone in kidneys. For three months I was under the care of an eminent doctor at Albany, but constantly growing worse, went home to die. At this time I was induced to try Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., and am now robust and strong. A remedy which can do this for one so near death as I was should be known everywhere. I hope this statement will cause others afflicted as I was to use the Remedy.—C. W. Brown, Petersburgh, N. Y.

THE SAILOR'S DARING.

"Man overboard! Stand by to lower away the boats!" With what alacrity every man on board springs to his post at the dread cry, knowing a fellow creature's life is at stake! Yet that life is in no more danger than that of the man or woman who trifles with what may seem "a simple blood disorder," but which in reality is fast sowing the seeds of a fatal disease, when the early use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery would cleanse the blood, restore impaired digestion, tone up the vital organs and ward off consumption. It should take the place in the family corresponding to that occupied by the life preserver on shipboard. If taken in time, and given a fair trial, "Golden Medical Discovery" is guaranteed to cure. This it will do if taken in the earlier stages of consumption, but after a large part of the lungs have broken down, no medicine can stay its fatal progress. How important then that the earliest premonitory symptoms be heeded! Short breath, spitting of blood, occasional chilly sensations creeping up the spinal column, hacking cough, variable or poor appetite, feeble digestion, with gradual loss of flesh, cold feet, lassitude or general debility, should admonish one that all is not right.

You can't afford to fool away precious time if suffering from any considerable number of the above significant symptoms of approaching danger! It's madness to trifle and experiment with uncertain means of relief and cure when thus afflicted! Don't forget, at such a critical time, that the only medicine possessed of such positive curative properties as to warrant its manufacturers in selling it, through druggists, under a positive guarantee of its benefiting or curing in every case, is the world-famed "Golden Medical Discovery." For all Bronchial, Throat and Lung Affections, Weak Lungs, and kindred ailments, it is an unequaled remedy.

For a Complete Treatise on Blood and Skin Diseases, or for one on Bronchial, Throat and Lung Diseases, enclose ten cents, in stamps, state which book you want and address, WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, 663 Main St., Buffalo, N. Y.

WHILE YET THEY KNOW.

We knew that every faint and fluttering breath
Was but a harbinger of hastening death.
We lavished love, caresses, untold care;
Poured out our souls in constant, pleading prayer,
While every sigh she breathed, each broken word,
Seemed to our hearts the sweetest ever heard.
Yea, when she knew no face, no tenderest tone,
But lay, unconscious of our love, alone,
None from that saddened chamber turned away
Till all that there remained was silent clay;
And even that we cherished, as was meet,
Till reverently laid beneath our feet.

Through joys and sorrows, hopes and cares and fears,
We swiftly move toward the grand, eternal years;
Forgetting that the least brief step we tread
Tends toward that vast 'majority," the dead—
That with each lightest breath there shall remain
One link the less of life's unmeasured chain.
(So heavy is the vail that lies between
The seen of earth, the heavenly unseen.)
Nor is one left alone—on either hand
Those who crave help or love beside us stand.
Then, friends and brothers, give to these, O give
Their meed of tenderness while yet they live!

BULGER'S PARACHUTE.

An Adventure in the Mountains of North Carolina.

A Party of Hunters Have Lots of Fun with Two Worthless Curs—Why Bulger Is His Former Master's Sworn Enemy.

"Did you ever hear about the 'Devil's Court-House' on the head waters of the Tuckasiege?"

The speaker was a prominent clergyman living in the interior of this State and visiting friends in St. Louis. On being assured that no information of the court-house aforesaid had ever reached the city, the divine unbosomed himself, figuratively, of course, and imparted reminiscences of the locality to a party of gentlemen recently assembled in a down-town office.

"'The Devil's Court-House' is not a building, as might be supposed, but a mountain in Western North Carolina. It is a huge mass of rock, square on top, and from a distance bears some resemblance to a massive castellated building, whence, I suppose, its name, for the locality is wild and rude in scenery, and in North Carolina, as elsewhere, remarkable features of nature are not infrequently ascribed by tradition to some occult influence—usually to the devil.

"The mountain is precipitous on every side, cliffs rising perpendicularly from the valley beneath, and not everywhere could an ascent be made. A bold climber could make a route for himself at any one of a dozen points, but so difficult was the task that most of those who attempted to reach the top took a tolerably well-known path which led, by a fairly easy climb, about half way up one side, when you came to a narrow ledge, in some places not more than a foot in width, which traversed horizontally or by a gentle ascent one of the bold cliffs constituting a side of the mountain. After the ledge was passed the remainder of the road to the top was comparatively easy, but passing the ledge was the point, for it was nothing but a narrow shelf, and on it you could see above only the clouds and overhanging cliffs; below, nothing broke the vision for five hundred feet, and so deep was the abyss that yawned before you that the Tuckasiege seemed like a silver thread, and the tall pines growing along its banks like ornamental shrubs on the lawn. Particularly awe-inspiring was the passage of one point, where the shelf windened to a dozen yards and afforded lodgment to a number of bushes. There the path was on an overhanging part of the precipice, and not even by lying down and peeping over could you see the cliff beneath you. It was as though you were suspended between heaven and earth.

"Just below this resting-place in the road was the ledge where Bige Hipsher met the bear. Bige was a good-humored, happy-go-lucky fellow, who had a cabin and a little inclosure, and a patch of corn for 'dodgers,' and a wife who designated him as 'her old man,' and half a dozen tow-headed brats who called him 'daddy,' a shoat or two and a cow, a lot of dogs and an old mare that he rode to town with her colt squealing a quarter of a mile behind, and by hunting and setting traps for 'varmints,' by killing the old sow's pigs at Christmas, selling the calf and working a little when he had to, Bige got comfortably along through the world, did as well as his neighbors, anyhow, and didn't care to do any better lest they should think him 'stuck up.'

"Some time ago there came a party of gentlemen from Wilmington on a hunting excursion, and, hearing of Bige as a good hunter, they looked him up and hired him for a few days as guide. The gentlemen were led by a Nimrod always addressed as the Major, and were well provided with guns, dogs and the usual hunting paraphernalia. Bige was delighted with the job and asked leave to take along a cousin of his, Rancy Bottom, whose home and surroundings, as well as personal appearance, closely resembled those of Bige. Of course Rancy—Rance for short—was also delighted to go, and when the party started out they were duly equipped not only with guides, but with guides' dogs, for both Bige and Rance were followed by half a dozen mongrel curs, which did not agree any too well with the hounds brought by the gentlemen.

"Rance and Bige, at the earnest solicitations of the gentlemen, tried to drive the curs back, but the mongrels were not to be deterred by such trifles as stones, and after many ineffectual attempts and no end of cursing from Bige and Rance, the effort was given up and the dogs allowed to continue with the party, or rather to skirmish from a hundred yards to a half mile on every side, for which way soever the party went the curs were before and behind, on the right and left, and between their barking up every tree where a squirrel had been a week before, and tearing through the brush like mad after every rabbit that came in sight, and bawling into every hollow log they came across in the suspicion it might shelter a 'possum, they frightened away all the game, while, by inadvertently waking up a polecat or two, they disgusted the hunters so that the Major proposed to shoot the whole pack.

"Before the propriety of this step was seriously considered, however, the party came to the Devil's Court-House and began its ascent. Cautiously they crept along the narrow ledge, made the ascent, enjoyed the view from the top—for there was nothing else to enjoy, the curs having scared away all the game—took their lunch and began their return.

"They were pretty tired by the time they got back to the wide place in the shelf-path, and all sat down to rest. One of the party crawled on his face to the edge, peeped over, and called attention to the depth of the gorge beneath. 'If a man should fall over there he'd never live to touch bottom,' said one. 'Throw one of the dogs over,' said another. 'Yes, that will give us some fun, at least, to pay for what they have spoiled for us," spoke up another.

"The proposition was promptly negatived by both Rance and Bige, who, though they had no great love for the dogs, did not care to see them disposed of in that way. Their scruples were easily disposed of, however, by the production of a half a dollar by one of the gentlemen, who offered to buy a dog. Now, in the mountains of Western North Carolina a half dollar looks as big as a cart wheel; so, when the fifty-cent piece was drawn forth and offered to Bige in exchange for one of his worthless curs, his mind was made up on the spot. The exchange was consented to, and Bige selected the cur that was to be made a sacrifice. The yelping victim was dragged to the edge of the cliff, when some one suggested to give him a chance for his life by extemporizing for his benefit a parachute. The idea was voted a good one; a number of shrubs were cut down and tied together, and then fastened by a string around the dog's body; he was tumbled over by the hands of Bige, and he went down like a shot. Peering over the awful chasm with curious gaze the spectators beheld him strike a large stone at the bottom, rebound and fall back a shapeless mass of flesh.

"'That parachute was a failure,' said the Major, and, as the dog at the bottom did not stir after they had watched him through their glasses for five minutes, the statement was generally accepted as embodying a fact.

"'Try the umbrellas,' said one, and all at once it was remembered that two light umbrellas formed a part of the impediments borne by Bige and Rance.

"'Agreed,' was the general shout, and negotiations were at once opened with Bige for another cur to be offered up on the altar of science, or, in plain language, to be tossed over the cliff. But Bige did not want to sell any more dogs, he didn't know what his old woman would think of such performances, and in Bige's cabin the gray mare was the better horse. Rance was not so scrupulous. He was willing to sell a dog for the experiment, but not at Bige's figure. His dogs were better than Bige's, and the least he could think of taking for one was a dollar. The dollar was contributed, the dog changed owners, and the opened umbrellas were fastened to a stout strap that was placed round the dog's body just behind his forelegs.

"Rance took the dog in his arms, and at the command 'over with him,' flung out the brute into the air. The dog gave a terrible yell of fright as he sank, and the umbrellas wavered to and fro to such an extent as to justify the belief that the second canine was destined to share the fate of the first.

"But he did not; as his body descended the umbrellas caught the air, his fall became slower, and, finally, he sank softly among some bushes. The party watched until sure of his safe arrival on terra firma, when they hastened down to rescue him and recover the umbrellas. The Major was first on the spot, when he found the dog had lodged in the shrubbery which had caught the umbrellas; he was uninjured, but in such a position that only his hind feet reached the ground. He whined to the Major as the latter approached. The latter unbuckled the strap, released the dog and by this time the rest of the party were near at hand.

"'Go to your master,' said the Major. 'Here, Bulger,' called Rance, but not a step moved Bulger from the side of the Major, crouching between his feet and apparently begging his protection. Nor could threats or persuasion induce Bulger to go to Rance, and whenever the latter came near the dog fled to the Major, and, getting behind him, would bark and snarl at Rance as though possessed of a burning desire to give him hydrophobia. These curious antics he kept up the rest of the day, avoiding Rance and clinging to the Major as his savior. The party slept at Bige's cabin, passing the house of Rance on the way thither, but into Rance's yard Bulger would not go, although to the entreaties of his former master were added those of his former playmates, the numerous offspring of the house of Bottom.

"Bulger knew what he was about, and stayed close by the Major, followed him to Bige's cabin, lay as near to his feet as he could all the evening, crawled under his bed at night, and waited for him to wake in the morning before stirring abroad. And during all the rest of the Major's stay in the neighborhood Bulger could not be induced to leave him for a moment, and from the time Rance took the dog in his arms to toss him over the cliff Bulger seemed to be inspired by a violent passion whenever his former owner came in sight, on more than one occasion springing at his throat, so that Rance was only prevented from shooting the dog by the stern remonstrance of the Major.

"Touched by the attachment of the dog for himself and by the resentment the canine evidently felt for the man whom he held responsible for his aerial flight, the Major protected Bulger, and when he left for his home in Wilmington took Bulger along; and many a time has the story of the dog been told to the Major's friends, for the last time I heard of Bulger he was as grateful to the Major as on the day when the latter unbuckled the strap that fastened him to the umbrellas."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

PATRICK CASEY'S SCHEME.

It Promised Well, But Didn't Pan Out for a Cent.

One day a man who spoke with the Irish brogue came over to the store and inquired for me by name, and when I stepped out of the office he inquired:

"Would you like to make $75,000 in a year?"

"Why, certainly."

"It may cost you as much as $7 per week, but you'll be sure to get your fortune in twelve months."

"Explain."

"Well, I know a man named Mulcahy who's got consumption and must die. He used to be a robber, but has reformed now. He made $75,000 in cash at one haul, and it lies buried up the river. He says he'll never touch a cent of it, but I know that the man who takes care of him until he dies will be told where that money is."

"Why don't you take him?"

"I'm a widower, sir."

"But you must have friends?"

"So I have, but I'm giving you the first choice. If you don't want it I'll find others."

The result was that Mulcahy came to see me. He looked like some one I had seen before, but I could not tell who. I saw that he had only a few months to live, and without referring to the $75,000 or the fact of his having been a robber, I sent him to a comfortable boarding house and agreed to furnish him with $7 per week. For ten straight months I paid his keep, and he dressed well and had plenty to eat and drink. One day I was sent for to find him dying. I was sorry, of course, but business is business, and as soon as I could make opportunity I said:

"John, you are going to die."

"Yes, soir."

"And that—that money up the river, you know?"

"Yes, soir."

"Hadn't you better tell me just where to find it?"

"There's none there, soir!"

"What!"

"Niver a cent, soir."

"But Casey said there was."

"He did, soir. Casey is my brother, and we fixed on that story that I might be properly cared for in my last days. You are a gintleman, soir, if I do say it, and I'll leave you the razor that I've owned these four and twenty years! Good-by to yees, soir, and if you could do the fair thing by me and pay the funeral expenses and buy a headstone, I'd go feeling quite content!"—New York Sun.

IT WILL BE EVER THUS.

An Anecdote Which Illustrates the Peculiarity of Human Nature.

A citizen of Harlem who was approaching the railroad depot, followed by a dog, halted and picked up a stone and flung it at the canine with the exclamation:

"You good-for-nothing cur, but I'd like to knock your head off!"

Just then a man came down a side street, followed by a second dog, and halted to say:

"I've got another just such cur here. He isn't worth his weight in soap grease."

"I'll poison mine this very night!"

"And I'm going to throw mine under the locomotive."

"Say," said the second man, after a moment's thought, "call your cur up here and let's get 'em to fighting."

Good idea. Here, Jep—Jep—Jep! Come here, doggie!"

The dog cautiously approached, and as the two animals began growling and walking around each other a sudden "Stuboy!" brought a climax, and they began fighting. Both men laughed, but it wasn't a minute before the first man, whose dog was underneath, kicked the dog on top.

"Hold on, now. Give my dog a fair show!" shouted the other.

"He's the biggest!"

"No, he ain't! Don't you kick my dog again!"

"I'm a good mind to kick his owner!"

"I'd like to see you try it!"

"I can do it!"

"You're a liar!"

And with that they began whaling away at each other with great vigor, ending after five minutes in a draw. Meanwhile the dogs had quit and disappeared.

"I allow no one to kick my dog!" gasped one, as he wiped at his bloody nose.

"And no living man can call me a liar!" growled the other, as he held his black eye.

"I'll see you again!"

"And I'll see you!"—New York Sun.

He Was Superstitious.

Tramp—Madam, will you give me something to eat?

Woman—Will they never stop coming? I have already given bread and coffee to twelve tramps this morning.

Tramp—Then excuse me, madam. I may have my failings, but I will yet trudge wearily and hungrily onward before I will make the thirteenth.—Boston Herald.

Rough on the Professor.

Professor (to student who had on in the lecture hall a loud cravat instead of a white one)—Those loud cravats are becoming very fashionable, it seems.

Student (somewhat confused)—No, professor; they never are.—Texas Siftings.

Time and Number.

They stood at the gate in the pale moonlight,
Observers, there were none;
He pressed her hand and said, "Good night!"
And added, "Kate, just one!"

"Just one!" she said, in assumed surprise,
And she dropped her lashes then
And curtained the bright, love beaming eyes—
"Well, I should say just ten."

"All right!" he cried, with a rapturous look,
And did not a moment wait,
But drew her to him, and ten he took
Ere she could expostulate.

She gasped for breath as she fixed her hat,
And her blushes came and went,
As she murmured, "You know I didn't mean that;
I—I thought 'twas the time you meant."

OLD-STYLE DUEL.

General Davis Describes an Encounter He Once Had With a Judge.

In his racy book, "Recollections of Mississippi," General Reuben Davis gives the following account of a personal encounter he once had with a judge who had fined him for contempt:

"My patience gave way, and I felt myself in a perfect blaze of sudden fury. I had in my pocket a very fine knife with a long, thin blade. As I sprang to my feet I drew out this knife, opened it, and threw it point foremost into the bar, looking steadily at the judge all the while. My object was to induce the judge to order me to jail, and then to attack him on the bench. The knife vibrated, and the weight of the handle broke the blade near the handle. General S. J. Gholson and several others ran upon the bench beside the judge, ordered the sheriff to adjourn court, and carried the judge out of the court-room, while a number of persons seized me. * * * Judge Howry being withdrawn, prudent men among my personal friends condemned my action, and appealed to me to let the matter stop. I agreed to this. Intending to pass straight to my hotel, I saw Judge Howry come forward toward the place where I was standing. I awaited his approach, and when close to me asked him if he had intended by his fine to insult me. He said, "No." I then said I had been guilty of no offense to justify such an indignity, and requested some explanation. He replied. "I do not, sir, explain my official conduct to any man." In a moment I had slapped him in the face with my open hand. By some accident a claw-hammer had been left on the floor near-by; he seized this and struck at me violently, while I got from my pocket the broken knife and opened it. The blow of his hammer fell upon my head, cutting through my hat and several files of papers to the bone. I made another strike at his jugular with the corner of my knife-blade. This blow fell upon his jaw, and I seized him with my left hand by the collar and pushed my head into his face. He struck again with the hammer, breaking and depressing the outer blade of my skull bone but not until I had inflicted three more cuts upon his jaw. As we were pulled apart he gave me the third blow. I went to my room and sent the Judge a message not to leave his room unarmed as I would attack him upon sight.

The court met again that evening. I had put on a fur cap, with the back part before, to conceal my wounds, and the judge wore his overcoat, with the collar well drawn up, to hide the tokens of combat on his person. I did not meet Judge Howry for seven years after this affair. I had gone to Pontotoc to attend the Federal court, and was sitting in a room with Roger Barton and Chancellor Chalmers when Chalmers was sent for from below. He soon returned and said to me: "I suppose, Davis, you care nothing now about that affair between you and Judge Howry?" I promptly replied that I thought nothing of it; that Howry was a gentleman, and that our difficulty was casual and without malice. Chalmers then said that Howry was below, and would be glad to come up to Barton's room. He did so, and I met him at the door, and we greeted each other in the most cordial manner. Until his death no two men could be more sincerely friendly than we continued to be. I shall always believe that he went down to his grave without finding out what led to our quarrel that day, and I am perfectly certain that I shall go down to mine in equal ignorance, unless he comes back to tell me."

NEW WATER DISEASE.

A Baltimore Man Attacked With Hydatidcyst of the Liver.

A rare and serious disease, which is known as hydatidcyst of the liver, is being watched with great interest by the professors, doctors and medical students at the city hospital. The patient is a German, John F. Boisenbruch, and he is forty-four years of age. His disease is due to the ova, of a peculiar kind of tape worm which inhabits the dog and other animals. The ova find their way into the stomach of a man in drinking water and are thence carried to the liver by the blood vessels. The egg is about one-hundredth of an inch in diameter and the parts which develop it are found in the water on the ground and stick to the surface of vegetables uncooked to take the ova into the body. The animals from these ova, however, are not developed in man. The eggs once in the stomach of a man increase at an enormous rate. From the stomach of a man they are absorbed by the blood vessels leading to the liver. Here too ova form cysts or little bags around themselves, like the caterpillar in its cocoon. When this cyst is taken into the stomach of the dog it develops into the full-grown hydatid, which is one-quarter of an inch in length with a head one-sixtieth of an inch and having numerous little hooks and suckers.

Boisenbruch was admitted to the city hospital on October 25, 1889. He was a laborer at the Jesuit College, in Woodstock, and had complained of a dull, but severe pain in his right side since last spring. He had wasted away and lost nearly forty pounds of flesh. The doctors at the city hospital diagnosed his case and on November 14, Prof. Chas. F. Bevan, in the presence of Drs. B. W. Chambers, T. S. Latimer, W. W. Smith and John Branham, performed what has up to the present time proved a very successful operation. Prof. Bevan made an incision in the wall of the right side of the abdomen, just below the ribs and about a gallon and a half of pus was taken from the man's liver. The method of removing the hydatidcysts is by means of draining the liver, which operation is of modern surgical art. The pain of the patient before the operation was intense, the tumor in his right side having extended his liver nearly fifteen inches. The great pain seemed to leave him after the operation and he now appears to be recovering.—Baltimore Letter.

SAVING PUPIL'S PENNIES.

The Excellent School Savings Bank System in Long Island City.

All the school children of Long Island City have an excellent opportunity of putting into practice the old axiom that "Economy is wealth." Three or four years ago the banking system was introduced into the various public schools in that city. Collections are made every Monday morning, and those pupils who are saving and careful of their money find great pleasure in responding to the question, "How much have you got?" Each pupil is furnished with a neatly printed card on which the deposits are credited. These cards are highly treasured. They bear these inscriptions: "Good principles and good habits are in themselves a fortune." "The habit of saving is an essential part of a true practical education." On the last page are these mottoes: "Take care of the pennies and the dollars will take care of themselves." "The masses know how to earn better than how to save."

When the school opens on Monday morning the teacher takes out the roll book and as she calls the names, the pupils call out the amounts of money they want to deposit, each in turn stepping up to the desk with the money and records the amount on the card and in her own book. After the collection each teacher delivers the money to the principal, who deposits it the same day in the Long Island City Savings Bank in the name of each depositor. One cent or upward can be received by the teacher. When the pupil has a deposit of one dollar or more a bank book will be given free of charge from the bank. The pupils are requested not to withdraw deposits until the amount reaches $3, except in cases of sickness or removal from the city; but if the deposit should be withdrawn and the amount has been less than $3, the bank will charge ten cents for the bank book. Deposits of $1 and over bear interest. The bank books of the pupils are kept by the principal as long as the children attend school. If they want to leave the school or at vacation the book is given to them and they can withdraw their money, but they will require the presence of their father or mother and the signature of the principal. During the summer vacation of the school deposits may be made or money withdrawn from the bank direct, the cashier acting during that time for the teacher.

Only about ten minutes' time is consumed in making up the collections in each school, so that it can not be objected that it materially interferes with the regular work of the public school. This ten minutes each Monday morning has more excitement in it for the children than the events of all the rest of the week put together. Their eyes sparkle and their faces glow with excitement. Five cents is the average deposit, and the pupil who has more than that amount announces it in a voice that plainly denotes satisfaction. The lad who deposits half a dollar or possibly a dollar is regarded with admiration by his fellow pupils, who look upon him as a future millionaire. As the amount grows the boys and girls become more eager to save. Many have some specific object in view. Although the girls outnumber the boys as depositors the latter have the largest amount to their credit. It is in the primary and intermediate grades that the largest collections are made. The higher the grade of school the fewer the depositors.—Brooklyn Eagle.

MR. BIXBY'S BARGAIN.

As a Shopper the Old Man Proves Himself a Decided Failure.

"Talk about your bargains," said Mr. Bixby, as he came home to dinner the other day, and fished around in the skirt of his coat before sitting down to the table, "I got a bargain to-day that'll make you open your eyes. Just lookee here. What you reckon I paid a pair for them socks? Hey? Less by half, I'll warrant, than you paid for any pair you've bought since we've been married. Look at em! Did you ever see such socks before for fifty cents a pair?"

"Fifty cents? Why Mr. Bixby!"

"Oh, I thought you'd be s'prised. They're worth seventy-five cents at the lowest, ain't they?"

"Let me see them," said Mrs. Bixby, quietly. "You didn't notice, I suppose, that they're moth-eaten a little and shop-worn. The heel is single; they're not mates; they're nearly all cotton, and they'll crack badly. They're the same kind I saw sold Saturday at twenty cents a pair, and—"

But Bixby had seized his hat and gone down town for dinner.—Drake's Magazine.

The Highest of All Enjoyment.

One of the highest and best enjoyments comes through what is done for others. This is believed in theoretically, but seldom practically. If a man has money, he imagines that the way to enjoy it is either to keep and accumulate it or to spend it on personal gratification; yet he misses the very finest of its delights when he refuses to share it or its benefits with others. So with our time, our talents and our thoughts—kept to ourselves, or used simply for our own delectation, they do not give us a tithe of the real enjoyment that they afford when we use them liberally for the benefit of the family, or friends, or the community. No one who has once tasted the sweets of ministering successfully to the happiness of others will ever again relapse into a purely selfish use of his advantages.—N. Y. Ledger.

—The ingenuity of book agents has advanced another step. Instead of carrying around their book with them, a proceeding that betrayed them and prevented them from obtaining admission to most of the houses and offices at which they called, the smartest of them now have their books carried by a small boy who follows them. Without any sign of their calling they have little difficulty in getting admission to an office, and, once inside, after broaching their business, they step to the door and call: "Johnny, come in!" and in trots the boy with the books, upon the merits of which the agent proceeds to dilate with a vigor and persistence that can be shut off only by a subscription or by forcible ejection from the place.

MELANCHOLY.

Melancholy
Sits on me as a cloud along the sky,
Which will not let the sunbeams through, nor yet
Descend in rain, and end, but spreads itself
'Twixt heaven and earth, like envy between man
And man—an everlasting mist. —Byron.

THE MASTER'S TOUCH.

The string that jars
When rudely touched, ungrateful to the sense,
With pleasure feels the master's flying fingers,
Swells into harmony, and charms the hearers.
—Rowe.

THE USE OF TOBACCO.

A Marked Change Taking Place in the Taste of the Public—Less Chewing.

Every tobacconist recognizes the great change that is taking place in what may be called in a rather new sense the public taste. Any average tobacconist, whose trade is not chiefly among sailors and truckmen, will tell you he does not sell one-half as much chewing tobacco as he did ten years ago, and not one-third as much as he did twenty years ago. Very likely he will be unable to guess why it is, but he can't deny the fact. I asked one of them about it the other day. He said:

"The change is due to a variety of causes. It is a great deal more apparent here in the east than in the west and south, but it is going on all over the country. One thing is undoubtedly the strength of public opinion that it is an uncleanly habit. It is hard for a man who chews to keep evidences of it from his clothes. That fact makes it inevitable that the habit should go down before the increasing attention to dress, that is a feature of modern life. Then a great many refined and well intentioned persons have waged war against it for years. It was inevitable that some effect should follow their crusade.

"But the principal causes are right here: There is a great deal more dyspepsia and stomach trouble in the country now than there used to be. And no person can chew tobacco who has a weak stomach. James Parton says in his famous pamphlet against rum and tobacco that the stomach will hold out against the weed longer than the lungs. James does not smoke or chew, and therefore he doesn't know. Common experience shows that he is wrong, and doctors support the verdict of common experience. The action of the tobacco juice, which trickles down the chewer's throat, is to paralyze the stomach. It will do that long before smoke will have any perceptible effect upon an ordinary pair of lungs.

"Then the cigarette has done a great deal to put an end to the habit of chewing tobacco. The growth of the cigarette practice in this country is, as they say of western towns, 'phenomenal.' The consumption of cigarettes has doubled many times over in the last fifteen years. About seven out of every ten boys who are growing up now smoke cigarettes. And after a boy has smoked cigarettes a few years he not only has no taste for tobacco in any other form, but he has no constitution left to stand chewing tobacco. It is curious how boys will take to cigarettes. I believe it is very largely because of the fuss that is made about them. It has got to be the common opinion that cigarette smoking is the most injurious practice known. That is just why boys adopt it. It makes them an object of awful interest to other boys and to girls. It is soothing to a boy's foolish pride to know that people have marked him out as one who is rushing with frightful temerity to early destruction. Whether that is the cause of it or not, it is perfectly certain that more and more cigarettes are being sold every year and less and less chewing tobacco."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Col. E. B. Dickinson on Reporting.

"Tell me something about the practical work of your profession, colonel."

"There is one very usual blunder that is made by many in regard to our work which perhaps might interest you. That is the idea that if we lose part of a sentence some important word will suggest what comes next. Take a long hand sentence like this, for example: 'I went this morning to see an — friend of — who has — very — and found — much better.' Now, it is easy enough to supply the blanks here by the use of a very little ingenuity. 'An — friend' is undoubtedly 'an old friend;' the next blank is 'mine,' and when we have read the 'and found [him] much better' we make the other blanks tell us 'who has [been] very [sick.]' Well, people say why cannot the same method be used in our reports? Simply because we depend upon our context for the word, instead of on the word for the context. Take our example again. The stenographic character which represents 'this' may also under different circumstances be 'things' or 'thanks' or 'these.' 'Bsns' in stenographic character standing alone is perfectly unintelligible, because it may be business, or absence. Of course we can vocalize, that is, indicate, the vowels of a word, but generally we haven't any time for that. Unusual words, such as 'multiform,' we nearly always vocalize."—New York Times.

Status of the Japanese Player.

The social status of the Japanese player is paradoxical. It is higher than that of his Chinese brother and yet it is not. He is often in trouble, usually deep in debt; despised in private, adored in public. Maidens are taken little to the theatre lest they should love unwisely. Previous to the restoration society was divided into eight classes. Actors, with courtezans and genteel beggars, occupied the seventh, the only class below them being that of the etas—pariahs, social outcasts, who tanned leather, dug graves, killed animals, executed criminals. Even the rough, ignorant wrestlers stood higher in the scale than the most refined comedians—than the most powerful exponents of the tragic art, who at will could stir the soul with joy or sorrow. Wrestlers were admitted on the outskirts of good society, much as Tom Cribb was in the days of our prince regent; comedians never. "Clothed in embroideries, living in plenty—yet a beggar!" was the sad soliloquy of a famous player who, stricken well nigh to death, found himself debarred from claiming the assistance of the court physician.—Murray's Magazine.

—Hitherto it has been supposed that English miners in the middle of the eighteenth century first utilized parallel rails, like modern railway tracks, in the transportation of burdens. In a "Description of the World," by Sebastian Munster, 1541, a wood cut has been found containing a representation of a little four-wheeled cart loaded with ore, and with a man behind shoving it along parallel rails. The scene of the wood cut is an Alsatian mine of the first part of the sixteenth century. Munster calls the car in question instrumentum tractorum, and mentions that its four wheels were of iron.

CORRESPONDENCE

Oasis, February 4, 1890.

MR. C. MULHOLLAND—Dear Sir: As you wish to know of the principal fights of the Indian wars of 1864—65 particularly of the last and final engagement at Owens Lake, it is perhaps proper that I should tell you how I was obliged to take part in the different conflicts, and the events that led to the battle at the Lake.

As you know, the Indians had been gathered together to the number of about two thousand at Fort Tejon after the preceding war and everything in and about the Valley wore an aspect of peace. The feed for stock was very good and people finding this out began to come in from California with their herds. The mines of the county were coming into prominence, particularly those of Bend City and San Carlos, and we all looked forward to a prosperous era. It was on July 8, 1864, that I started for Los Angeles to buy a band of horses and after being there about three months I heard from parties from Owens River that the country from Los Angeles to Owens Valley was swarming with hostile Indians. Having interests in the Valley I at once hurried back to look after them, meeting with no Indians on the way. On arriving here I found the whites very much excited and for our mutual protection we proposed to form a military company. This was done and the men conferred upon me the honor of leader and Captain and W. L. Moore Lieutenant. About the middle of November the Indians attacked a party of men camped on Wyman Creek near Deep Spring Valley, shooting William Matthews, breaking his jaw, and killing a man by name of Crow while he was at work in a shaft. James Burns, who was working with him, miraculously escaped with some severe bruises and was left for dead, but after the Indians left he managed to crawl to the camp and give the alarm. The miners immediately left the camp for Owens River leaving the provisions in charge of the Indian Joe Bowers and his tribe, who at the outset were friendly to the whites. On the miners giving the alarm a party of men from Bend City and an equal number from Bishop joined forces and under my leadership started into Deep Spring Valley to give the Indians fight; but when we got there no Indians were to be found. The camp showed signs of having been attacked but had been defended by Joe Bowers who decamped upon the arrival of the whites, leaving the camp and provisions undisturbed, which speaks well for Captain Joe, who was an uneducated savage. We buried the dead man and returned to the Valley. A small party of us had gathered at Bend City to see the year of 1864 out and the new year in, and just as the new year came in news was brought us that a woman and boy had been killed and the house burned at Haiwai Meadows by the Indians. There were also two men there at the time and we gathered a number of men together and set out to render assistance to the living and punish the Indians if we could overtake them. When we got there we found the house burned and the bodies of the woman and little boy had just been removed by a neighboring ranchman. The trail of the two white men was followed until lost among the rocks, the Indians having followed them about two hundred yards. From the number of tracks I should judge there were about twenty-five Indians who attacked the house. Their trail led toward their camp and we turned to follow the white men, whom we thought might be hurt, and found them at Little Lake. My men were indignant toward the two men for having left the woman and boy at the mercy of the savages and would certainly have hanged or whipped them but for the intervention of V. G. Thompson, who thought the fright, and the shame they now felt was sufficient punishment. The men in their own defense said they could not use their ammunition as the Indians had set fire to the roof and it was dropping all around them. Neither could they see the savages to shoot at as the walls of the house were of stone with no apertures for pointing a gun out. They suggested that they put the woman and boy between them, throw open the door and rush out, which, I think, would have been a doubtful way of escaping; but the woman said no, she knew she had to die as she had a presentiment to that effect, and that they had better save themselves if they could, as two lives saved would be better than they all should be killed, which they certainly would be if they all stayed there, so the two men broke out and made good their escape. The woman was found dreadfully mutilated and the little boy was found with a stone clinched in each hand which showed that he did all he could in his mother's and his own defense. Thinking that the next point of attack might be at the Coso Mill, which place was then beginning to flourish, we made for there but everything was peaceable. From there we went to the lower end of the big lake and thence to Lone Pine. From there we sent a friendly Indian to the hostiles and ordered them to come up and camp below us a little way and give up the murderers of the woman and boy. The Indians refused to come and deliver the murderers and our party was worked up to a frenzy and we determined to annihilate the Indians. So I ordered the men to take rest and sleep and report early in the morning, when we would make one swoop and put an end to this Indian trouble. The Indian camp as I learned was on the shore of the lake on the west side of the mouth of the river. It was my intention to surround the camp, making escape by land impossible, so in the morning, the men all having reported for duty and being eager to avenge the wrongs committed by the Indians, we set out. I divided the company and sent a party under W. L. Moore down the east side of the river to intercept any Indians who might try to escape by crossing the river. With the remainder I went down the west side placing my men so as to make a wide breast and prevent the hostiles from passing our lines. When about a half mile from the camp an Indian scout sprang out of the bushes shouting out his war whoop to alarm the others. We attacked them at early dawn and those who did not fall at the first fire took to the lake where some were shot and others drowned. Of the whole band only four were known to have escaped, two bucks, one squaw and a boy. It had not been the intention of any of our men to injure the squaws, but after having chased the Indians and punished them we returned to the Indian camp and found McGuire, the husband of the murdered woman, crazy from grief at losing his wife and child, shooting the squaws and continuing to shoot into them even after they were dead. The fight at the lake took place on the morning of the 6th of January, 1865.

The names of those who participated in the battle at the lake are —— Hall, Dan Payne, Geo. Whiteman, J. J. Moore, James Hefner, C. Roberts, L. M. Payson, W. A. Greenly, James Byrnes, —— Walsh, Andy Hitchcock, "Dad" or W. L. Moore, C. D. Begole, —— Walsh, Dick Mead, —— Pond, Alf. Cowles, —— McGuire, Hugh Edwards, Oscar Bacon, Green Hichcock, —— King, Berlin Pearce and nine others whom I cannot remember the names of.

Yours Truly,
W. A. GREENLY.

—[In addition to the names given by Captain Greenly Mr. Joseph Fernbach of Independence gives the following names of men who took part in the fight: Thos. Passmore, Thos. May, —— Standiford, Joseph Fernbach, Charles Bailey and —— Derbin. There were also two Germans, brothers, known only as John and Bill. The man whose name is given by Captain Greenly as —— King was a terrible villain. He afterwards murdered a man named Rogers at Olancha. He cut up the body of his victim, salted the flesh, cooked and served it to people who stopped at his place to eat. The flesh was recognized as part of a human body. King was arrested, sent to Visalia, tried, found guilty of murder and hanged.]

A Danger Peculiar to Residence in Flats.

The Lancet (London) raises its voice of warning to apartment house occupants, which is worth considering. An ordinary householder has access to every portion of the building in which he lives, and should he suspect a defect, he can ascertain how far his suspicion is correct, and remedy it. But in the case of flats, while the actual apartments rented may be free from all risk of evil, the tenant is, in point of health, almost entirely at the mercy of his landlord and of the occupiers of the basement, in so far as the main drainage of the premises is concerned. If this latter be wrong, the whole mansion is apt to be filled with foul air frow below upward. A number of cases have come under our notice in which very serious ill health has been thus induced, and in which tenants have only been too glad to pay what was demanded of them in order to get out of the premises with the least possible delay. While no one should take a residence without skilled advice as to its sanitary state, this precaution is more than ever necessary in the case of flats, where the entire premises, including, above all things, the basement, should be thoroughly overhauled.

Washington Society.

Perhaps you think I exaggerate. I don't mean to say every woman makes forty calls a day or every day. But the congressman's wife above quoted said to me: "I often make thirty or thirty-five calls in an afternoon. The greatest number I ever made was thirty-eight. I think I could make more if I had a better driver. I've heard of ladies making forty-five or fifty." Mrs. Fuller, the chief justice's wife, says she has made thirty-one calls between luncheon and dinner, and that she knows of a senator's wife who has made forty-eight in two hours. Mrs. Fuller could not keep up with her obligations, she says, if she didn't have four lively daughters to help her. She has 300 or more callers every Monday. The cabinet ladies have found it simply impossible to return calls, having often as many as 1,500 cards in a day, and last December they concluded to give up returns except their calls of etiquette on the wives of the supreme court justices and senators.—Washington Letter.

British Red Tape.

It is doubtful if anything in the "red tape" line can excel two instances recently brought to public notice in connection with the military service of England. So minute are the reports required that Sir Evelyn Wood, commander at Aldershot, recently had occasion to record the momentous fact, with all the paraphernalia of imposing official document seals and the like, the thrilling fact that a private soldier had fallen over a stone and skinned his nose. Another instance of puerile inefficiency is seen in the case of a soldier who, while in Egypt in 1884, had an overissue of rations amounting to seventy cents. This has been the subject of a vast amount of official correspondence, involving reams of paper and rolls of red tape, and it has finally been settled by the discovery that the soldier held a certificate in full for the provisions in dispute.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Superior Court of Inyo County California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

WEDNESDAY, February 26.

Estate of John Henry Meyer, deceased—Petition for final distribution filed. Order fixing day for hearing settlement of final account and petition for final distribution.

Estate of Duncan Campbell, deceased—Filed petition for order to authorize executors to lease certain real estate. Order issued.

Mikado to-night.

The down train will be here to-night with a through mail.

Mr. A. O. Collins of Warm Spring was in town to-day.

An excellent supper will be given at the Independence Hotel at 12 o'clock to-night.

E. L. Benedict has been appointed Superintendent of the Standard mine at Bodie.

The Mikado of Japan will make his appearance at Mairs' Opera House to-night en suite.

Mr. Alexander McNett of Fish Lake Valley, Nevada was at Independence some days this week.

L. J. Rose of Los Angeles has sent eighty-six head of trotting horses to New York. All are to be sold.

Augustus Pettibone, for several years Superintendent of the Standard mine at Bodie died on February 8th of pneumonia.

It is expected that Andy Fyfe will soon begin extensive development of the mine recently bought by him from Kincaid, at Silver Peak.

The Governor has appointed Hon. John F. Rooney, Superior Judge of Tuolumne county to try the Broder-Conklin case at Independence.

John Baxter says he has not lost a day's plowing in the last four weeks, for all the growling about bad weather. He has sown most of his wheat crop already.

John Hughes, an old timer who was at Swansea years ago, spent some days in town this week. He has been in Arizona for several years past and returned here recently.

Visitors to Bishop complain of the bad condition of the roads near the town. A little levying up over the worst places would help the roads very much and would be a benefit to the town.

Recent storms did so much injury to the road over the Inyo Mountains that the teams hauling borax from Saline Valley had to stop till the road could be repaired. The delay will not continue long.

The Homestake mine at Candelaria is to be turned over to the purchasers on March 11th. It is expected that as soon as the transfer shall be made work will at once be a great revival of work at the mine.

At Big Pine Washington's Birthday was duly celebrated by a party at Crocker's Hotel. There was a large attendance and, as usual at that pleasant place, everybody appeared to enjoy the occasion hugely.

The trial of Jim Elliott case has been set for April 25th at Bakersfield. It will be exceedingly inconvenient for the witnesses who must go from Inyo [illegible] of them are farmers and this is a busy time for them.

Hon. Patrick Reddy has been appointed Receiver for the American Sugar Refinery at San Francisco. This is another step taken by the Courts in the breaking up of the system of wholesale robbery perpetrated under the name of trusts.

Nevada papers report that dead horses are scattered all over the ranges with the hoofs worn off from their front feet. The poor beasts pawed the frozen ground in search of something to eat until they were starved to death.

Mr. George Story was in town a day or two every in the week. He had finished up run of ore at the Poleta mine and came on with the bullion. He says there is nothing more than reasonable wages to be made in working the mine.

Miss May Shepherd arrived home last Monday from San Francisco. She has been gone since last May visiting relatives at Los Angeles and her sister, Mrs. Butler, at San Francisco. Her health is much improved by her travels.

Down in Salt Wells Valley from Little Lake canyon to Redrock canyon two thousand head of cattle are wintering. The animals look well. During the past two or three weeks young grass has been coming up rapidly and the cattle are gaining in flesh.

John Powers is enclosing a tract of land in Grape Vine Canyon, twelve miles north of Freeman (Coyote Holes). He will seed the tract to Alfalfa. There is a fine stream of water in the canyon a short distance above the county road that flows all the year around.

The G. A. R. Post at Independence honored the birthday of Washington by giving a party at Mair's Hall. Dancing was continued until near midnight when supper was served at the Norman House. After supper the company dispersed, having enjoyed a very pleasant evening.

The Superintendent of the Census, Mr. Robert L. Porter, requests by letter that mention be made in this paper of the fact that he has sent blanks for statistics to the county officers. These blanks are for a report covering a period of ten years and relate to the finances of the county during all that time. It will require a good deal of labor to prepare such reports and for this work the county officers will not receive one cent; but as these statistics are of great value in making up the census report the officers will without doubt give as much time and care as possible to their preparation.

Mt. Vernon Prince.

The latest acquisition to the list of trotting stallions of the county is Mt. Vernon Prince. In his pedigree will be found the names of the best speed producers in America. He is sired by Mt. Vernon, 2:21 brother to Woodnut, by Nutwood, 2:18¾. he by Belmont 64, he by Abdallah 1, sire of Hambletonian 10 and George Wilkes, the leading trotting families. The dam of Mt. Vernon Prince is a full sister to Mollie Drew by Winthrop, dam Fanny Fern, a standard mare. Mt. Vernon Prince is a dark bay with black points, hind feet and pasterns white. He is 16 hands high and weighed 1142 pounds on his arrival here, having lost 18 pounds on the trip. He is good dispositioned and a free mover. He is large for a three-year-old and has never been worked for a record. Mt. Vernon Prince is owned by N. E. Conklin. He will make the season to a limited number of mares, his books being already full.

Making a Home.

Five years ago Alexander McNett settled on a piece of desert land on the west side of Fish Lake Valley, Nevada. Everybody else though the place was quite worthless. During the present season Mr. McNetts 11 fifteen hundred dollars worth of hay from the place. He has a young orchard bearing fruit of various kinds and of fine quality. It is a good property and increasing in value each year. Throughout Nevada are places where industrious men could locate and make homes as Mr. McNett has done. This beats tramping wearily over mountains and deserts searching for mines with a pack on the back and very little to eat. The location of Mr. McNett commands a fine cattle range; he has already a nice band of cattle and many of these fed on the range during the present winter without the help of any hay and they now look well.

Quartetly Meeting.

On Sunday week, March 9th, the Superintendent of the Nevada Mission, Rev. E. Van Deventer, will hold Quarterly Meeting at Lone Pine. At 10:30 a. m. there will be love feast and regular service at 11 o'clock. At Independence the Sunday school meeting will be postponed till 4 o'clock p. m. instead of the usual hour. Mr. Van Deventer will address the meeting. Preaching by Mr. Van Deventer at 7 o'clock in the evening. Everybody cordially invited to attend the meetings.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m., at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening; Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

For several years past St. Patrick's day has been duly observed at Keeler. This year the festival will be celebrated by a party at the Lake View Hotel. Mr. and Mrs. Barnes never fail to entertain their visitors most cordially and pleasantly. Keeler never fails to be well represented when there is anything going on at Independence and we should not miss the only opportunity of the year to return the compliment.

The north bound train on the C. & C. road got stuck near the summit of the White Mountains last Tuesday and consequently there was no down train on Wednesday. With the heavy wind that prevailed north the snow that had recently fallen drifted so that it was not possible to keep the road over the mountains open. The Central Pacific and Virginia & Truckee roads were again blockaded.

The bridge across the stream at the south end of town is in a dangerous condition. The carriage of the Independence Hotel was crossing yesterday and horses and carriage fell through. Parties approaching or leaving town after dark should drive around the bridge; it is easy to pass above or below. The Roadmaster says there is no money in the fund to pay for repairs. It is disgraceful that the bridge should be in such a condition.

Hon. A. J. Gould is in very poor health at Darwin. Mr. Gould is about sixty-two years old. He has always been an industrious and honorable man but, like many others who have sent their lives prospecting mines, he has never accumulated money. He made a good and upright representative in the Legislature. He has no relatives in the county to take care of him and his life and services entitle him to the considerate care of his fellow citizens now that he may need it.

The Chronicle-Union says Kirman and Rickey have lost six hundred head of cattle on their Antelope Valley ranch in Mono county. They are also reported to have lost ten thousand head on their Humboldt range in Nevada. All the cattlemen north of Inyo county have suffered very heavy loss in the late storms. There has been no loss of stock in this county.

At the marble quarry a lot of yellow marble is being got out for the Palace Hotel, San Francisco. Extensive alterations are being made at the Palace and this most beautiful stone will be used. The yellow marble when polished looks like gold and when in place at the Palace will be seen and admired by people from all over the world.

It is a curious fact that there are far less than the usual vast numbers of ducks and other wild fowl at Owens Lake this winter. It might be expected that the extraordinary severity of the winter in the regions north of us would have sent the birds here in much greater numbers than usual but the fact is as stated.

OFFICIAL.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

"Yes, it can't have been very pleasant."

"Pleasant—but there, we have done with each other now—we don't even speak much except in public; that's my price for holding my tongue about the lady in London and one or two other little things—so what is the use of talking of it? It was a horrible nightmare, but it has gone. And then," she went on, fixing her beautiful eyes upon his face, "then I saw you, Edward, and for the first time in my life I learned what love was, and I think that no woman ever loved like that before. Other women have had something to care for in their lives; I never had anything till I saw you. It may be wicked, but it's true."

He turned slightly away and said nothing.

"And yet, dear," she went on, in a low voice, "I think it has been one of the hardest things of all—my love for you. For, Edward," and she rose and took his hand and looked into his face with her soft eyes full of tears, "I should have liked to be a blessing to you and not a curse, and—and—a cause of sin. Oh, Edward, I should have made you such a good wife, no man could have had a better, and I would have helped you, too, for I am not such a fool as I seem, and now I shall do nothing but bring trouble upon you; I know I shall. And it was my fault, too—at least, most of it. Don't ever think that I deceive myself, for I don't; I led you on, I know I did, I meant to—there! Think me as shameless as you like, I meant to from the first. And no good can come of it, I know that, although I would not have it undone. No good can ever come of what is wrong. I may be very wicked, but I know that"—and she began to cry outright.

This was too much for Edward Cossey, who, as any man must, had been much touched by this unexpected outburst. "Look here, Belle," he blurted out on the impulse of the moment, "I am sick and tired of all this sort of thing. For more than a year my life has been nothing but a living lie, and I can't stand it, and that's a fact. I tell you what it is: I think we had better just take the train to Paris and go off at once, or else give it all up. It is impossible to go on living in this atmosphere of continual falsehood."

She stopped crying. "Do you really care for me enough for that, Edward?" she said.

"Yes, yes," he said, somewhat impatiently; "you can see I do or I should not make the offer. Say the word and I'll do it."

She thought for a moment, and then looked up again. "No," she said, "no, Edward."

"Why?" he asked. "Are you afraid?"

"Afraid!" she answered, with a gesture of contempt, "what have I to be afraid of? Do you suppose that such a woman as I am has any care for consequences? We have got beyond that—that is for ourselves. But we can still feel a little for others. It would ruin you to do such a thing, socially and in every other way. You know that you have often said that your father would cut you out of his will if you compromised yourself and him like that."

"Oh, yes, he would do that. I am sure of it. He would never forgive the scandal; he has a hatred of that sort of thing. But I could get a few thousands ready money, and we could change our names and go off to some colony or something."

"It is very good of you to say so," she said, humbly. "I don't deserve it, and I will not take advantage of you. You will be sorry that you made the offer by to-morrow. Ah, yes, I know it is only because I cried. No, we must go on as we are until the end comes, and then you can discard me; for all the blame will follow me, and I shall deserve it, too, for I am older than you, you know, and a woman; and my husband will make some money out of you, and then it will all be forgotten, and I shall have had my day and go my own way to oblivion, like thousands of other unfortunate women before me, and it will be all the same a hundred years hence, don't you see? But, Edward, remember one thing. Don't play me any tricks, for I am not of the sort to bear it. Have patience and wait for the end, for these things cannot last very long, and I shall never be a burden on you. Don't desert me or make me jealous, for I cannot bear it, I cannot, indeed, and

"Tell me how you like my new dress."

I do not know what I might do—make a scandal, or kill myself or you, I'm sure I can't say what. You nearly sent me wild the other day when you were carrying on with Miss de la Molle. Ah, yes, I saw it all. I have suspected you for a long time, and sometimes I think that you are really in love with her. And now, sir, I tell you what it is, we have had enough of this melancholy talk to last me for a month. What did you come here for at all this morning, just when I wanted to get you out of my head for an hour or two and think about my garden? I suppose it was all a trick of Mr. Quest's bringing you here. He has got some fresh scheme on; I am sure of it from his face. Well, it can't be helped, and since you are here, Mr. Edward Cossey, tell me how you like my new dress," and she posed herself and courtesied before him. "Black, you see, to match my sins and show off my complexion. Doesn't it fit well?"

"Charmingly," he said, laughing in spite of himself, for he felt in no laughing mood, "and now I tell you what it is, Belle: I am not going to stop here all the morning, and lunch and all that sort of thing. It does not look well, to say the least of it. The probability is that half the old women in Boisingham have got their eyes fixed on the hall door to see how long I stay. I shall go down to the office and come back at half past 2."

"A very nice excuse to get rid of me," she said; "but I dare say you are right, and I want to see about the garden. There, good-by, and mind you are not late, for I want to have a nice drive round to the castle. Not that there is much need to warn you to be in time when you are going to see Miss de la Molle, is there? Good-by, good-by."

CHAPTER IX.

THE SHADOW OF RUIN.

Mr. Quest departed to his vestry meeting with a smile upon his thin, gentlemanly looking face and rage and bitterness in his heart.

"I caught her that time," he said to himself; "she can do a good deal in the way of deceit, but she can't keep the blood out of her cheeks when she hears that fellow's name. But she is a clever woman, Belle is; how well she managed that little business of the luncheon, and how well she fought her case when once she got me in a cleft stick about Edith and that money of hers, and made good terms, too. Ah! that's the worst of it; she has the whip hand of me there; if I could ruin her she could ruin me, and it's no use cutting off one's nose to spite your face. Well, my fine lady," he went on, with an ominous flash of his gray eyes, "I shall be even with you yet. Give you enough rope, and you will hang yourself. You love this fellow, I know that, and it will go hard if I can't make him break your heart for you. Bah! you don't know the sort of stuff men are made of. If only I did not happen to be in love with you myself I should not care. If—ah! here I am at the church."

The human animal is a very complicated machine, and can conduct the working of an extraordinary number of different interests and sets of ideas, almost, if not entirely, simultaneously. For instance, Mr. Quest—seated at the right hand of the rector in the vestry room of the beautiful old Boisingham church, and engaged in an animated and even warm discussion with the senior curate on the details of Fourteenth century church work, in which he clearly took a lively interest and understood far better than did the curate—would have been exceedingly difficult to identify with the scheming, vindictive creature whom we have just followed up the church path. But, after all, that is the way of human nature, although it may not be the way of those who try to draw it and who love to paint the villain black as the evil one and the virtuous heroine so radiant that we begin to fancy we can hear the whispering of her wings. Few people are altogether good or altogether bad; indeed, it is probable that the vast majority are neither good nor bad—they have not the strength to be the one or the other. Here and there, however, we do meet a spirit with sufficient will and originality to press the scale down this way or that, though even then the opposing force, be it good or evil, is constantly striving to bring the balance equal. Even the most wicked men have their redeeming points and their rights and their righteous instincts, nor are their thoughts continually fixed upon iniquity. Mr. Quest, for instance, one of the evil geniuses of this history, was, where his plots and passions were not immediately concerned, a man of eminently generous and refined tendencies. Many were the good turns, contradictory as it may seem, that he had done to his poorer neighbors; he had even been known to forego his bills of costs, which is about the highest and rarest exhibition of earthly virtue that can be expected from a lawyer. He was, moreover, eminently a cultured man, a reader of the classics, in translations if not in the originals, a man with a fine taste in fiction and poetry, and a really sound and ripe archæological knowledge, especially where sacred buildings were concerned. All his instincts, moreover, were toward respectability. His most burning ambition was to secure a high position in the county in which he lived, and to be classed among the resident gentry. He hated his lawyer's work, and longed to accumulate sufficient means to be able to give it the goodby and to indulge himself in an existence of luxurious and learned leisure. Such as he was he had made himself, for he was the son of a poor and inferior country dentist, and had begun life with a good education, it is true, which he chiefly owed to his own exertions, but with nothing else. Had his nature been a temperate nature, with a balance of good to its credit to draw upon, instead of a balance of evil, he was a man who might have gone very far, indeed, for in addition to his natural ability he had a great power of work. But unfortunately this was not the case; his instincts on the whole were evil instincts, and his passions—whether of hate, or love, or greed—when they seized him, did so with extraordinary violence, rendering for the time being utterly callous to the rights or feelings of others, provided that he attained his end. In short, had he been born to a good position and large fortune, it is quite possible, providing always that his strong passions had not at some period of his life led him irremediably astray, that he would have lived virtuous and respected, and died in good odor, leaving behind him a happy memory. But fate had placed him in antagonism with the world, and yet had endowed him with a gnawing desire to be of the world, as it appeared most desirable to him; and then, to complete his ruin, circumstances had thrown him into temptations from which inexperience and the headlong strength of his passions gave him no opportunity to escape.

It may at first appear strange that a man so calculating and whose desires seemed to be fixed upon such a material end as the acquirement, by artifice or even fraud, of the wealth which he coveted, should also nourish in his heart so bitter a hatred and so keen a thirst for revenge upon a woman as Mr. Quest undoubtedly did toward his beautiful wife. It would have seemed more probable that he would have left heroics alone and attempted to turn his wife's folly into a means of wealth and self advancement; and this would no doubt have been so had Mrs. Quest's estimate of his motives in marrying her been an entirely correct one. She had told Edward Cossey, it will be remembered, that her husband had married her for her money, the £10,000 of which he stood so badly in need. Now this was the truth to a certain extent, and a certain extent only. He had wanted the £10,000, in fact, at the moment money was necessary to him. But, and this his wife had never known or realized, he had been and still was, also in love with her. Possibly the £10.000 would have proved a sufficient inducement to him without the love, but the love was none the less there. Their relations, however, had never been happy ones. She had detested him from the first, and had not spared to say so. No man with any refinement—and whatever he lacked Mr. Quest had refinement—could bear to be thus continually repulsed by a woman, and so it came to pass that their relations had always been of the most strained nature. Then when she at last had obtained the clew to the secret of his life, under threat of exposure she drove her bargain, of which the terms were complete separation in all but outward form, and virtual freedom of action for herself. This, considering the position, she was perhaps justified in doing, but her husband never forgave her for it. More than that, he determined, if by any means it were possible, to turn the passion which, although she did not know it, he was perfectly aware she bore toward his business superior, Edward Cossey, to a refined instrument of vengeance against her, with what success it will be one of the purposes of this history to show.

Such were, put as briefly as possible, the outlines of the character and aims of this remarkable and contradictory man, whose history, had he but possessed a sense of honor, might probably have been painted in very different colors.

Within an hour and a half of leaving his own house, The Oaks, as it was called, although the trees from which it had been so named had long since vanished from the garden, Mr. Quest was bowling swiftly behind Edward Cossey's powerful bay horse toward the towering gateway of Honham castle. When he was within 300 yards he pulled the horse up sharply, for he was a good whip, and alone in the dog cart, and paused to admire the view.

"What a beautiful place!" he reflected to himself with enthusiasm, "and how grandly those old towers stand out against the sky. The squire has restored them very well, too, there is no doubt about it; I could not have done it better myself. I wonder if that place will ever be mine. Things look black now, but they may come round, and I think I am beginning to see my way."

And then he started the horse on again, slowly reflecting on the unpleasant nature of the business before him. Personally, he both liked and respected the old squire, and he certainly pitied him, though he would no more have dreamed of allowing his liking and pity to interfere with the prosecution of his schemes than an ardent sportsman would dream of not shooting pheasants because he had happened to take a friendly interest in their nurture. He had also a certain gentleman like distaste to being the bearer of crushing bad news, for Mr. Quest disliked scenes, possibly because he had such an intimate personal acquaintance with them. While he was still wondering how he might best deal with the matter he passed over the moat and through the ancient gateway which he admired so fervently, and found himself in front of the hall door. Here he pulled up, looking about for somebody to take his horse, when suddenly the squire himself emerged upon him with a rush, his pen in his hand (for he had been writing letters) and his white hair waving on the breeze.

"Halloo, Quest, is that you?" he shouted, as though his visitor had been fifty yards off instead of five. "I have been looking out for you. Here, William! William!" (crescendo), "William!" (fortissimo). "Where on earth is that boy? I expect that idle fellow, George, has been sending him on some of his errands, instead of attending to them himself. Whenever he is wanted to take a horse he is nowhere to be found, and then it is 'Please, sir, Mr. George'—that's what he calls him—'Please, sir, Mr. George sent me up to the Moat Farm or somewhere, to see how many eggs the hen laid last week, or something of that sort. That's a very nice horse you have got there, by the way; very nice, indeed."

"It is not my horse, Mr. de la Molle," said the lawyer, with a faint smile; "it is Mr. Edward Cossey's."

"Oh! it's Mr. Edward Cossey's, is it?" answered the old gentleman, with a sudden change of voice. "Ah, Mr. Edward Cossey's. Well, it's a very good horse anyhow, and I suppose that Mr. Cossey can afford to buy good horses."

Just then a faint cry of "Coming sir, coming," was heard, and a long hobble-de-hoy kind of a youth, whose business it was to look after the not extensive stables, emerged in a great heat round the corner of the house.

"Now, where on earth have you been?" began the squire, in a stentorian tone.

"If you please, sir, Mr. George"——

"There, what did I tell you?" broke in the squire. "Have I not told you time after time that you are to mind your own business, and leave 'Mr. George' to mind his? Now take that horse round to the stables, and see that it is properly fed.

"Come in, Quest, come in. We have a quarter of an hour before luncheon, and can get our business over," and he led the way through the passage into the tapestried and paneled vestibule, where he took up his stand before the empty fireplace.

Mr. Quest followed him, stopping ostensibly to admire a particularly beautiful suit of armor which hung upon the wall, but really to gain another moment for reflection.

"A beautiful suit of the early Stuart period, Mr. de la Molle," he said; "I never saw a better."

"Yes, yes; that belonged to old Sir James, the one whom the Roundheads shot."

"What! the Sir James who hid the treasure?"

"Yes. I was telling that story to our new neighbor, Col. Quaritch, last night—a very nice fellow, by the way; you should go and call upon him."

"I wonder what he did with it?" said Mr. Quest.

"Ah, so do I, and so will many another, I dare say. I wish that I could find it, I'm sure. It's wanted badly enough nowadays. But that reminds me, Quest. You will have gathered my difficulty from my note and what George told you. You see this man Janter has, thanks to that confounded fellow, Maj. Boston, and his action about those college lands, thrown up the Moat farm, and George tells me that there is not another tenant to be had for love or money. In fact, you know what it is, one can't get tenants nowadays, they simply are not to be had. Well, under these circumstances, there is, of course, only one thing to be done that I know of, and that is to take the farm in hand and farm it myself. It is quite impossible to let the place fall out of cultivation—and that is what would happen otherwise—and if I were to lay it down in grass it would cost a considerable sum, and be seven or eight years before I got any return."

The squire paused and Mr. Quest said nothing.

"Well," he went on, "that being so, the next thing to do is to obtain the necessary cash to pay Janter his valuation and stock the place—about four thousand would do it, or perhaps," he added, with an access of generous confidence, "we had better say five. There are about fifty acres of those low lying meadows which want to be thoroughly bush drained—bushes are quite as good as pipes for that stiff land, if they put in the right sort of stuff, and it don't cost half so much—but still it can't be done for nothing, and then there is a new wagon shed wanted, and some odds and ends; yes, we had better say five thousand."

Still Mr. Quest made no answer, so once more the squire went on.

"Well, you see, under these circumstances—not being able to lay hands upon the necessary capital from my private resources, of course I have made up my mind to apply to Cossey & Son for the loan. Indeed, considering how long and intimate has been the connection between their house and the De la Molle family, I think it right and proper to do so; indeed, I should consider it very wrong of me if I neglected to give them the opportunity of the investment'—here a faint smile flickered for an instant on Mr. Quest's face and then went out. "Of course they will, as a matter of business, require security, and very properly so; but as this estate is unentailed, there will fortunately be little difficulty about that. You can draw up the necessary deeds, and I think that, under the circumstances, the right thing to do would be to charge the Moat farm specifically with the amount. Things are bad enough, no doubt, but I can hardly suppose it possible under any conceivable circumstances that the farm would not be good for £5,000. However, they might perhaps prefer to have a general clause as well, and if it is so, although I consider it quite unnecessary, I shall raise no objection to that course."

Then at last Mr. Quest broke his somewhat ominous silence.

"I am very sorry to say, Mr. de la Molle," he said gently, "that I can hold out no prospect of Cossey & Son being induced under any circumstances to advance another pound upon the security of the Honham castle estates. Their opinion of the value of landed property as security has received so severe a shock that they are not at all comfortable as to the safety of the amount already invested."

Mr. de la Molle started when he heard this most unexpected bit of news, for which he was totally unprepared. He had always found it possible to borrow money, and it had never occurred to him that a time might perhaps come in this country when the land, which he held in almost superstitious veneration, would be so valueless a form of property that lenders would refuse it as security.

"Why," he said, recovering himself, "the total incumbrances on the property do not amount to more than £25,000, and when I succeeded my father, forty years ago, it was valued at fifty, and the castle and premises have been thoroughly repaired since then at a cost of five thousand, and most of the farm buildings also."

"Very possibly, Mr. de la Molle; but to be honest, I very much doubt if Honham castle and the lands round it would now fetch £25,000 on a forced sale. Competition and Radical agitation have brought estates down more than people realize, and land in Australia and New Zealand is now worth as much per acre as cultivated land in England. Perhaps as a residential property and on account of its historical interest, it might fetch more, but I doubt it. In short, Mr. de la Molle, so anxious are Cossey & Son in the matter that I regret to have to tell you that so far from being willing to make a further advance, the firm have formally instructed me to serve the usual six months' notice on you, calling in the money already advanced on mortgage, together with the interest, which I must remind you is nearly a year overdue, and this step I propose to take tomorrow."

EVIDENCE FROM A WELL-KNOWN FIRM OF SAN FRANCISCO DRAYMEN.

These testimonials are constantly coming to the office of the proprietors of the best remedy on earth—THE GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE. This is positively a purely vegetable medicine that is warranted to do the work it is advertised to do. For sale by all druggists.

Sierra Chemical Co., 2424 Mission street, San Francisco, Cal.:

GENTLEMEN: My partner and myself purchased one dozen bottles of your Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure. We have taken it, and to our surprise find there is one first-class remedy that actually does the work it is advertised to do. We join in giving the GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE the highest recommendation, and would advise all that are debilitated in any way to give it a trial, as we have done. Very respectfully yours, FARNSWORTH & RUGGLES, 100 California street, San Francisco.

Who kills all the dead letters? Miss Direction.

Mr. Hakes' Luck.

It was current on the streets of Cairo the day following the great December drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery, that one-fortieth of ticket 98,455 that drew the capital prize was held here, but some days elapsed before it was known who held it. Finally it was reported that Mr. Z. A. Hakes, a sub-contractor under Little & Greenley on the Cache levee work, was the lucky man, and that he had gone to New Orleans to draw his money. Learning yesterday that Mr. Hakes was in town, stopping at Uncle Joe's Hotel, the Argus sent a reporter to interview him.

Mr. Hakes is a quiet, small, plain appearing man, about fifty years of age. He is an intelligent, energetic man that one would take to be well suited to his business. He is averse to notoriety, but does not hesitate to tell the facts in regard to his windfall. As reported, he held one-fortieth of the ticket that drew $600,000 in the December drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery, and had been down to New Orleans and collected his money, $15,000. He went by the Mobile & Ohio road. Upon arriving in the Crescent City he proceeded to the office of the Louisiana State Lottery, where he presented his fractional ticket and without any trouble got the large sum of money it called for. He apprehended that identification would be necessary, but was told in the office that possession of the ticket was all that was necessary.

He was afterwards the recipient of courtesies at the hands of the lottery officials, who deemed him their guest, as one who had come a long distance to transact business with them, and of additional interest to them as one taking a portion of the great capital prize of their December drawing. His praise of the hospitality they extended to him is unstinted.

Mr. Hakes deposited his money in a Cairo bank, and it is safe to say will use it to the best advantage for himself.—Cairo (Ill.) Argus December 30.

A club of German students in Bohemia has been dissolved by the police. It had adorned its assembly room with portraits of the Emperors Wilhelm II and Fredrich III, of Bismarck and of Moltke, and with two pictures of the German National Monument on the Niederwald, all of which tended to glorify the triumph of the new German Empire. This was brought forward in the Austrian Reichsrath as a sign of the anti-Austrian sentiment of the German element in Bohemia, and the club was suppressed.

HOPE FOR THE SICK.--ONE REMEDY FOR ONE DISEASE.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a single bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of domestic remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The specific for Catarrh cures that and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. To these is added a specific for Fever and Ague, one for female weakness—a general tonic and blood maker that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility." These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease is sent free on application by HOSPITAL REMEDY COMPANY, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

THE GRAVE GETS TIRED YAWNING,

Seemingly, for certain wretched invalids who toddle feebly along, though always looking as if they were going to die, but omitting to do it. They dry up, wither, dwindle away finally, but in the mean time never having robust health, know nothing of the physical enjoyment, the zest of that existence to which they cling with such remarkable tenacity. They are always to be found trying to mend by tinkering at themselves with some trashy remedy, tonic or "pick me up" to give a fillip to digestion, or "help the liver." If such misguided folks would resort and adhere to Hostetter's Stomach Bitters it would be well with them. This superb invigorant supplies the stamina that the feeble require, by permanently reinforcing digestion and assimilation. It overcomes nervousness, insomnia, malaria, kidney complaints, biliousness, constipation, rheumatism and neuralgia.

THE OLD, OLD STORY.

A little cough; a feeling ill;
A headache oft; a daily chill;
A slower walk; a quickened breath;
A frequent talk of coming death
No strength to rise from day to day;
From loving eyes he fades away.
Now lifts no more the weary head,
The struggle s o'er; the man is dead.

Such is the fatal progress of consumption. How often is repeated the old, old story. Yet not half so often as it was before the knowledge came to mankind that there was a discovery in medical science by which the dread disease could be arrested in its early stages and the patient restored to health. This wonderful remedy is Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery.

HOW I SAVED MY LIFE.

I was taken sick while at the dinner table with terrible distress in my stomach. Before this I had been hearty and strong. For fourteen days I kept getting worse, despite the efforts of two doctors. I lost forty pounds, and was satisfied that I could live but a few days. My trouble was Stomach and Liver Complaint, resulting in an attack of bilious colic. At this time I saw Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., advertised, and sent for a bottle. I also sent for my physician, and told him that I was going to try the Favorite Remedy. He examined it and told me to use it three days and let him know the result. In the three days I walked four miles. Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy has saved my life.—W. S. Bitzer, Slate Mills, Ross Co., Ohio.

A NEW TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result of this discovery is that a simple remedy has been discovered which permanently cures the most aggravated cases of these distressing diseases by a few simple applications made (two weeks apart) by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free by A. H. DIXON & SON, 337 and 339 West King Street, Toronto, Canada.

CUPID IN MEXICO.

The Requirements of Courtship in the Land of the Montezumas.

When a young man sees a young lady to whom he wishes to pay his addresses—he may have caught a glimpse of her at a window, or on the street, or met her at a tertulia or evening party—he endeavors to get into communication with her to inform her that it is his desire to pay his addresses to her. It is entirely permissible for him to speak to her and convey his wish, and if she is inclined to respond to his desire, she must, if she is well-bred, tell him to "ask mamma." Then young Don Fulano begins to appear in the street where resides the lady of his heart. He paces up and down in front of the house and endeavors to catch a glimpse of her. All the senoritas, and the mamma, and the aunts, if there be any in the house, are on the watch for his appearance, and his promptness is taken to indicate that he is in earnest in the matter. It is permissible for him to send love letters to the young lady via the window, but that letter which contains the manifestations of his heart's tenderness must be handed by the senorita to her mamma, according to the rules of all decent society. If mamma approves, the young man is sure to find the senorita hovering about the balcony when he is pacing the sidewalk below, or, perchance, the sidewalk across the way. She may even send him notes, first having submitted them to the parental eye. Papa then begins to "take a hand" in the affair. He makes inquiry into the young man's pecuniary prospects. If the suitor is in business, his chances of promotion are considered and his salary known. If he is heir to an estate, that is inquired into minutely, the object, of course, being, if the young man is not satisfactory, to let the matter drop where it is and to reserve the daughter for a more eligible person. The young man's habits are, among respectable families, quite as much a matter of inquiry and investigation as his busines or financial prospects.

And still the young man is coming every day to "play the bear" (hacer el oso) beneath the window. Some young ladies, inspired by the jealousy of the feminine heart, demand that the young man shall appear "on schedule time" every day so as to make tolerably certain that he is not utilizing his time in the same way with some other fair one. If the girl is obdurate it may be six months or even a year that the young man must play the bear to her. She gets a peep at him through the curtains, spies him from odd windows and watches his daily exhibition of devotion with true feminine curiosity. If he has been "real good," as the girls say, he may, even after a few weeks, approach the window and whisper soft nothings to his lady love. Then he asks permission to call upon her, and, if it is granted, he gets on his best clothes and makes a most ceremonious call in the presence of the entire family, for this is a regular "state occasion." If he gets permission to call regularly, he perhaps comes every third day, but there is always some member of the family in the room, and the lover never gets a chance to have a word in private. He is always in the full blaze of domestic publicity.

The senoritas say that there are "ways" of talking with the eyes, the fan and the lips, and if they wish to show how real their affection is for their suitor, that words are unnecessary. The "enamorades" meet at tertulias, on the public promenade or at the theater. They have many opportunities of meeting, and may dance with one another under the eye of eternal vigilance. Marriage may come in a few months, or in a year or more, according to the means of the suitor or the wishes of the parents.—Mexico Cor. Boston Herald.

BULLYING A BULLY.

A Witness of the Sam Weller Stripe Silences a Brow-Beating Lawyer.

There is nothing a bully dislikes more than being himself bullied; and the man who ridicules every one else is ordinarily the most sensitive to sarcasm. At a criminal trial "the counsel for the plaintiff" had threatened, and in some cases had cruelly browbeaten, the witnesses, when it chanced that a hostler, who was simplicity personified, was called to give his testimony.

"Now, sir, I hope we shall have no difficulty in getting you to speak up!" said the attorney, in a very loud, commanding voice.

"I hope not, sir!" shouted the witness, at the top of his lungs.

"How dare you speak to me in that way?"

"I can't speak no louder!" screamed the hostler.

"Have you been drinking?"

"Yes, sir!"

"I should infer so" (fiercely) "from your conduct; what have you been drinking?"

"Corfee, sir!" hoarsely vociferated the knight of the stable.

"Something besides coffee, sir, you've been using! Don't look at me like that, sir!" (furiously) "look at the jury, sir! Did you have something in your coffee?"

"Yes, sir!"

"What was it?"

"Sugar!"

"This man is no fool, your Honor—he is worse!" stormed the counsel.

"Now, sirrah," turning to the witness, "look at me! What besides sugar did you take in your coffie this morning?"

The hostler collected his forces, drew a deep breath, and in a voice that could have been heard blocks away, bellowed out:

"A spune! A spune, an' nothin' else!"—Youth's Companion.

THE LIMEKILN CLUB.

Many Interesting Topics Discussed by Prominent Members.

Some weeks since the question of placing fire-escapes in Paradise Hall was brought up by Judge Hornbecker, who has a mortal fear of being burned alive. The matter was referred to a committee, and after the opening of the lodge Saturday evening, the chairman, Colonel Cahoots, announced his readiness to report, and reported as follows:

"1. Paradise Hall is subject to no less dan forty-one risks of bein' burned up.

"2. In case she eber cotches fiah while a meetin' is goin' on, at least a dozen of de members will be roasted.

"3. It will cost $1,750,284 to make de hall perfectly flahproof.

"4. Dis committee can not conscientiously recommend any sich outlay of money, but feels to advise dat we double our insurance on the buildin' an' trust in Providence.

"5. Also, in case of an alarm of fiah, dat de officers go out first, an' dat no one else move from his cheer until de said officers are out.

"6. Den will follow Giveadam Jones, Elder Toots, Rev. Penstock, Judge Keho, Shindig Watkins, Uncle Saunders, Judge Kabiff, Colonel Bangs, Stepback White and Prof. Tompkins in de order named. Samuel Shin will stand at de doah wid a ball club, an' any passun tryin' to git an advantage, will be knocked senseless, his pockets emptied, an' his body left to perish in de flames."

The question being upon accepting and adopting the report, a hot discussion prevailed for a few minutes, but the motion was carried by a respectable majority.

A letter from the mayor of Terre Haute, Ind., made inquiry if Moses Demosthenes Calloway was a member of the Limekiln Club. He not only claimed to be, but had applied for the position of janitor of the City Hall on the strength of such connection, and had said that the club, as a body, would recommend him. The books were consulted, and no such name could be found on the rolls. The secretary was therefore instructed to answer to that effect, and to suggest that any Terre Haute kicker practicing on the anatomy of the impostor would be sent a recipe for preserving cider so that it will remain sweet three years.

At this point Brother Whyfore Davis said he desired to call up the case of Broadtread White, who was expeled from membership about a year ago. Mr. White lives in Sandusky, and he came here to deliver his essay on "De Gradual Decay of Sentiment." He had then been elected about four weeks. On the afternoon of the day he was to lecture he started for Canada with Wykoff Johnson's overcoat, which had just been nicely trimmed with rabbit fur. A policeman overhauldd him, and he was allowed to depart for home without being prosecuted. He now appealed to be reinstated, giving as an excuse that he had just been acquitted of stealing a wheelbarrow on the grounds of kleptomania. That was what induced him to take the overcoat, and his lawyer had told the jury that he must be held blameless for what he elected to pick up.

"De case will not be considered," said the president, as he rapped Brother Davis to order. "De difference between a kleptomaniac an' a straight-haired thief is so slight dat we can't afford to make a distinction."—Detroit Free Press.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

A Ditch in the Desert About One Hundred Miles Long.

The Suez canal is about one hundred miles long. It is one-twelfth the length of the Red Sea, into which it conducts the waters of the Mediterranean, and these two bodies of water are nearly of the same level. They now flow into one another without docks, and the canal is well described as a ditch in the desert. The ditch is about three hundred feet wide at the top and one hundred and fifty feet wide at the bottom, and the water within it is as quiet as a mill-pond. It is of beautiful sea-green, and the contrast of this color with the bare yellow sands which line the banks of the canal makes it wonderfully beautiful. The canal is so narrow that ships can pass only at certain points. The average depth is about 24 feet, and many of the ships which pass through are more than 20 feet deep in the water. There is so little water under the bottoms that there can be no great speed.

The banks of this canal are of dry and thirsty sand. In some places they are kept back by pavements of stone and others by a net-work of twigs like the jetties of the Mississippi. It cost nearly $100,000,000 to build the canal. One of the great problems in making the canal was fresh water for the workmen. The work was begun in 1858, and the ruler of Egypt provided 25,000 laborers. They were relieved every three months, but it was necessary to feed them. It took 4,000 water casks, which were carried on the backs of camels, to supply them with drinking water, and this was kept up for five years. At the end of that time a fresh-water canal was arranged so that water was carried from the Nile to Ismaillia, and there is now a pipe which runs the whole length of the canal, and which carries fresh water from one end of it to the other.

The work of building harbors at Port Said and Suez was very expensive, and I took a look at the piers at Port Said. These piers are made of artificial stone composed of desert sand and cement. The machinery to make them was brought here from France, and the stones were made to throw into the sea. Each stone weighed twenty tons, and it took 25,000 of these massive rocks to form the bases of these piers. On the top of this foundation the piers were built.—Cor. N. Y. World.

PARLIAMENTARY WORK.

The Duties of Members of Parliament and British Cabinet Officers.

A glance at the work imposed upon members of Parliament will suffice to show that it involves no ordinary amount of wear and tear. Work begins in the committee rooms at noon, the House assembles at four, and the sittings are often prolonged till after midnight. Readers of the debates, as given in the morning papers, are becoming more and more familiar with the announcement: "The House was still sitting when we went to press." A newly-elected member of Parliament has a great deal to learn before he becomes conversant with his duties, and he is fortunate if he finds time to make himself even moderately well acquainted with the Blue Books, papers, etc., which are annually published. Besides his duties at Westminster he must attend to his constituents, must show himself among them from time to time, and must be ever ready to listen to complaints, suggestions, or even dictates. The work of a Cabinet Minister varies with the office he fills, the state of public business and accidental circumstances. He begins the day by making himself acquainted with the contents of the daily papers, and perhaps by giving a few minutes to his private correspondence. The study of official papers, Blue Books, etc., will occupy him till eleven o'clock, the ordinary time of attendance at his office, where he remains until the meeting of the house to which he belongs. The sittings in the House of Lords are generally very short; they rarely last more than an hour or two. In the House of Commons they are only too apt to run to the opposite extreme. In addition to official work, not a few hours are required for preparing Parliamentary speeches and extra Parliamentary discussions of various kinds. Besides being in constant communication with his secretaries, a Cabinet Minister has frequently to consult various officials and to grant interviews to those who can show any cause for requesting them. If in charge of any important measure in Parliament he must be present during every debate upon it, and often make speeches in its support. Replies to questions have to be carefully prepared, assistance being of course given by the permanent officials of the department. Attendances at Cabinet Councils and meetings of the Privy Council, at State balls and dinners, and meetings of every conceivable kind, absorb a large portion of the time unoccupied in Parliamentary work; and if to these items be added the multifarious duties of a private character which almost necessarily devolve upon him, it will be readily admitted that the work of a Cabinet Minister at the present day is such as to tax to the utmost even the highest degrees of mental and physical vigor. The diversified character of his work would appear to be its redeeming feature. To the ordinary member of the House of Commons, and especially to one who is not as yet hardened by experience, disappointment and a sense of weariness must often make themselves keenly felt. Many a man enters upon Parliamentary life under the idea that he has an important mission to fulfill, but session after session passes and he finds himself no nearer to the goal. Meanwhile, he has had to listen night after night to an incessant flow of talk, the larger portion of which is unattended by any practical result. Time and energy are alike misapplied and wasted, and though a powerful and huge machine is at work, the results too often appear practically nil. There are at times other reasons for disappointment and disgust. Speeches made and votes given for party purposes in support of measures believed to be mischievous must, in some cases at least, be productive of no ordinary amount of self-contempt.—Fortnightly Review.

JAPANESE GARDENS.

The Taste Displayed in Their Picturesque Arrangement.

Plots of ground even as small as ten feet square are exquisitely beautified by Japanese methods; so much do these people admire garden effects. There is truth in the suggestion that too many American "back-yards" are given over to coal ashes, tin cans and the garbage barrel, which by simple means and a little taste might be rendered charming to the eye. Such waste places in Japan would be made neat and cleanly to begin with; a few evergreen shrubs and one or two clusters of flowers would be planted; there would be a rustic fence projecting from the side of the house, and here and there a quaintly-shaped flower-pot containing a few choice plants. In gardens of more pretense there would be a little pond or sheet of water of irregular outline; and if so situated that a brook can be turned to run through it, a great charm is attained.

The picturesque features of such a streamlet are brought out with the aid of rock-fragments and even rounded bowlders; rustic bridges of stone or wood are made to span it, even the smallest pond having a bridge of some kind thrown across; hummocks and miniature mountains, six or eight feet high, over or about which the path runs, are always present. In the gardens of larger size the mountains grow to twenty or even forty feet high, and upon the summit a little rustic lookout with thatched roof is made. In still larger gardens several hundred feet square "the ponds and bridges, small hills and meandering paths, with shrubs trimmed in round balls of various sizes and grotesquely-shaped pines with long tortuous branches running near the ground, are all combined in such a way by the skillful landscape-gardener that the area seems, without exaggeration of statement, ten times as vast."—Outing.

—Mr. C. has a little voice, weak, feminine. "There is a dime for you, my brave soldier," he said, as he tossed the coin into the cap of a poor fellow who was blind. "Thank you, marm," was the response. "I'm not a woman," was the indignant reply. "Thank you, miss," was the prompt retort.—Chicago Times.

AN INDIAN PARTY.

Braves and Squaws Dance Merrily to the Sound of Weird Music.

It was to be held a short distance from the fort (the cantonment on the North Fork of the Canadian river, where we were stationed with other officers and their companies of the —— Infantry), and after a delightful walk we soon reached the tepee which had been erected for the occasion. Perhaps you do not know how a tepee looks or is constructed. Long, strong poles are placed in a conical shape, about twenty feet in diameter on the ground, meeting at the top, a few inches from the upper ends, which spread apart like a bouquet to form an opening for the escape of smoke. This frame is covered with tanned skins, often decorated with pictures and figures of grotesque shapes and colors, and so arranged as to leave unobstructed the opening at the top. Near the ground, on the weather-protected side is another opening, through which the occupants crawl on hands and knees. It is provided with a heavy skin, which serves as a door, and at night can be securely fastened on the inside. This door was wanting this night and through the opening poured the bright light, casting a weird enchantment over the scene, as the dark outline of the structure was clearly defined against the sky, the swarthy forms of the Indians darted back and forth, and away off in the distance, as far as the eye could see, stretched the broad, level prairie, bathed in moonlight and looking so tranquil, so at rest, that the distant howl of the coyote seemed to die away for want of strength to bear it on.

Entering the tepee we found many there before us, and as we took our places on the robes were awed by the hard, savage faces of the Indians, which they turned toward us in friendly glances as they continued their incessant chattering. Sitting back of the light were three young bucks, holding on their laps queer instruments made of twigs wound in the form of a drum, the tops covered with thick skins stretched tightly over them.

The dancers were seated in front of the visitors, and when the music began the squaws each went to the Indian with whom she wished to dance, took him by the hand and led him into the center of the circle. The partners each held their hands on their hips, their right arms interlocked, the buck facing one way, the squaw the other, and made a sort of stamping motion with their feet as they turned around and around; and when they had made two or three turns, both, like a flash, changed positions, interlocked the left arms and turned the other way. Sometimes two squaws would choose the same partner, and in this case one would dance on either side. How they could feel the enjoyment evinced by their faces one could hardly realize, for the sound of the instruments resembled that of a muffled drum, and, accompanied by the deep, monotonous voices of the Indians, sounded like a funeral dirge.

When the music stopped there was great laughing and talking, which we did not understand, but easily divined that as the dancers returned to their places the old squaws took great delight in teasing the younger ones, while the men poked fun at one another, and all enjoyed themselves like children.—Detroit Free Press.

KANGAROO LEATHER.

How the Skins from Which It Is Made Are Obtained in Australia.

Kangaroo leather will not absorb water as easily as other leather, owing to its compactness. Another point in its favor is the resistance which it offers to the acids in blacking.

The first years of the introduction of kangaroo skins in this country were marked by great difficulty in securing necessary supplies. Agents were sent abroad to secure supplies sufficient to meet the demand. The climatic characteristics of Australia and the pugnacious proclivities of the kangaroo were serious drawbacks. Considerable danger attended the hunting for the kangaroos. Winter starts in May and ends in December, the rest of the year being summer and excessively hot, with scorching winds, and the thermometer often climbing up to 140 degrees.

The kangaroos usually are hunted by a group of eight men. When brought to bay, the incidents are of the most exciting nature. Not infrequently the animal jumps like a flash for the hunter's chest and attempts to crush it with his fore feet. For this reason each man's breast is thickly padded with matting several inches in thickness. The hunters are armed with spears with a club attachment at the butt end. Thus equipped and mounted on swift horses, they dash into a herd of kangaroos with the agility and equipoise of circus riders, almost constantly standing erect upon their steeds, while they flourish their spears and clubs with remarkable dexterity. The kangaroo is able to jump clear over a horse. As the game is bagged it is deprived of its coat, which is stretched on the ground and pegged down to prevent shrinkage. The flesh furnishes food for the camp.

There are twenty different sorts of kangaroos, including blue, red, Wallaby, black, gray and Forrester. The latter is the most popular and is said to furnish the best leather. This arises from the fact that the Forrestor lives mainly in wooded sections. On the seacoast the skins are disposed of by auction to the highest bidder. The average price is in the neighborhood of seventy cents per pound. The hunters make fine incomes, the gains of some of them often amounting to thousands of dollars a year.—N. Y. Star.

He served creditably through the second war with Great Britain, and at its close resigned in July, 1816. —It is surprising that many farmers think so much of size in buying milch cows. Yield of milk and butter should be primary consideration. —If you have let your work horses unfortunately get thin during the winter lose no time in feeding up. The full strength of the animals will be required in plowing and seeding time. ROOMY STALLS.

The Health and Well-Being of Horses Dependent Upon Them.

It is surprising how little thought many of our farmer friends give to the important subject of fresh air, which, when animals are in confinement, is so intimately bound up with the question of space. Speak of giving the horses room enough, and nine in ten of the farmers we know will reply: "Oh, these stalls are big enough; they are five feet wide." Examination would probably reveal the fact that they were not even that; but even if they were, the entire space, including height from floor to ceiling, would not supply each horse with the quantity of space he ought to have. The minimum of space allowable for each animal is generally allowed to be eight hundred cubic feet, and if we take a stall six feet wide and a ceiling, as many of them are, not more than nine and a half feet from the floor, with, say twelve feet from the front of the stall to the wall back of it, and this gives us only six hundred and eighty-four cubic feet, less than the minimum allowance by nearly fifteen per cent. In addition to sufficient space, there must be adequate facilities for securing proper ventilation without drafts. Horses, like men, do not immediately show the results of confinement in close vitiated atmosphere or of over-work, but the reckoning comes at last for both man and beast, and many a man's horses have failed a year or two sooner than they need have done, merely from the want of attention to those hygienic conditions which can not be disregarded without jeopardizing the health and constitution of the subject. Moreover, in a short time it will be impossible to get the same amount of work from an animal whose health is affected by the unhealthy condition in which he is compelled to spend, in winter at least, more than half his life, and thus valuable time is lost as well as the services of the horse for the year or two by which the animal's life has been shortened. Health and comfort are far more important accompaniments of living both in dwelling and barn, than the occupant of the former is apt to consider.—National Live Stock Journal.

MR. BOWSER.

He Calls Up Old Memories—An Evening of Solid Comfort.

"Now for an evening of solid comfort," said Mr. Bowser the other evening, as he fell into his easy chair and cut the pages of a magazine. "Mrs. Bowser, do you ever realize how blessed we are?"

"Yes, indeed."

"While others fall by the wayside, we are spared."

"While others quarrel and bicker and seek the divorce courts, we love the stronger every day."

"Yes."

He got up and came over and kissed me, and upon returning to his chair, seemed lost in reflection for a moment, then he continued:

"How curious life is! Do you remember the day I first saw you?"

"I shall never forget it."

"I was on horseback, you remember, and you stood on the veranda of your father's house."

"You are a trifle mistaken, dear. The horse had thrown you off into a mudhole, and I shall never forget the picture you presented as you approached the house. At first I took you for"——

"What! A horse throw me off!" he interrupted.

"Certainly. Don't you remember how father"——

"Mrs. Bowser, are you crazy? I was never thrown from a horse in my life! I'd like to see the horse which could throw me off! You must be thinking of some one else."

"Why, dear, you lost your watch in the mud, and father fished it out. Don't you remember how our negro Tom scraped the mud off of you?"

"Not by a long shot! No nigger ever scraped me down! You must be thinking of that yellow haired dude you used to go with."

We were both silent for a time, and I hoped it was the last of it. My experience, although dating back over a few years only, has satisfied me that nothing aggravates a husband more than to bring up the silly things he said and did during his courtship. It seems to be a raw spot with the majority of them after the honeymoon is over. But Mr. Bowser was not satisfied. After four or five minutes he broke out with:

"It's curious what a dunce a man can make of himself with his eyes wide open."

"Y-e-s?"

"The idea that I should ever fall in love with you!"

"Or I with you!"

He glared at me over the top of his book, and there was another painful silence, broken at last by his saying:

"Well, I'll admit that I was in love; but I flatter myself that I didn't exhibit any school-boy nonsense."

"You were just like any other young man in love, Mr. Bowser. They have always been that way, and always will be, and it's no discredit to them."

"Do you mean to say I 'mooned' around like a calf?" he demanded.

"I don't know how calves 'moon,' as you term it, but you wanted to hold my hand, put your arm around me, and"——

"Hold your hand—never!"

"But you did!"

"Never—never!"

"Mr. Browser, I have one of my old diaries. Wait until I get it."

"Not much! You can't produce no old diaries nor forged documents on me! I anticipated an evening of solid comfort and you can see how it has turned out! Is it any wonder that so many husbands seek the saloons and gambling houses of an evening?"

At this moment the cook called me out to ask what she should prepare for breakfast, and a quarter of an hour later, when I returned to the back parlor, Mr. Bowser seemed deeply interested in his reading. I was glad of this, for I felt a bit conscience stricken, but I scarcely got seated when he asked:

"Was Emma Davis here today?"

"Yes."

"How was she looking?"

"Very well. I wanted her to stay until you came home, but she had to go at 4 o'clock. She asked to be remembered to you."

"Yes. I hope she has fully forgiven me."

"What for, Mr. Bowser?"

"You know."

"I haven't the least idea."

"Ha! ha! ha! What dissemblers women are. It was always a sore spot with you, though you would never admit it. How you do blush—ha! ha! ha!"

"Mr. Bowser, what do you refer to?"

"Why, there's no doubt that the dear girl once fondly expected to be Mrs. Bowser."

"Nonsense!"

"What!"

"Nonsense!"

"You say that simply for revenge, but I know better. We were as good as engaged when I met you."

"Trash, sir! She was engaged to Jack Smith long before you ever saw her, and they are to be married as soon as his time is out in the navy. Don't flatter yourself that she has anything laid up against you."

"Mrs. Bowser!" he began, as he got up and crossed his hands under his coat tails, "do you know who you are talking to?"

"I do."

"You are talking to a man who could have been Emma Davis' husband two years ago."

"I'll prove to the contrary."

"How?"

"By one of my old diaries."

"Diaries again! Always holding something over me. Now produce! I want to see one of those diaries you talk about."

I ran up stairs and got them out of one of Mr. Bowser's old boots, in which I keep them for safety. There were two of them, each for a separate year, and as I came down with them he looked puzzled and stammered:

"W—why, I—I—thought I"——

"Yes, you thought you had burned them, but you were mistaken. The books you got hold of the other Sunday when I was at church were two old receipt books of no particular value. I found everything turned topsy turvy, and I knew what you had been up to."

"Mrs. Bowser, I"——

"Wait! Let us look up the Emma Davis matter. Here it is. Under date of the 10th of July I write: Dear Emma was over today to congratulate me on my engagement, though she added that if Bowser was the last man on earth she would not have married him. She says his hair reminds her of pumpkins, and that his legs seem to be badly warped. The dear girl also"——

"Stop!" shouted Mr. Browser, his face as white as death.

"Yes, dear, but you made a certain assertion. I want to disprove it. I"——

"Mrs. Browser, I planned for an evening of solid comfort. You have made it an evening of torture and regret. If I never spend another evening at home you alone will be to blame for it."

"But you"——

"Stop right here! This is the limit. The worm has turned. To-morrow morning I go!"

But he is with me yet, and I have no fear but that we shall live out our lives together.—Detroit Free Press.

Quite a commotion was raised in San Francisco about the sufferings of unemployed people. The business men of the city held meetings and a large sum of money was subscribed to provide employment for the needy ones till reviving business should afford work for all. It was determined to give work to a large number of men at Golden Gate Park and pay them a dollar and a quarter a day. But then a committee of the unemployed went to the citizens committee and said the men would not go to work for less than two dollars a day. This would indicate that there is very little suffering among the unemployed in San Francisco. Men who are in real want will not stop to haggle about wages, but will be glad to go to work for what will buy food for their families and themselves. If there be any men among those unemployed who were in Ireland in 1847–8 they should relate their recollections of those years and it might help to check unreasonable demands that will turn away sympathy and help from real suffering.

The science of political economy has been cultivated till it has utterly destroyed all human sympathy between the employer and employed. To the employer the employee is no longer a fellow citizen but only a "hand," and when that "hand" no longer earns a satisfactory profit to the employer "it" —for it is only a "thing"—must in the interest of "science" be flung away to die, to rot, and be resolved into other elements for the use of "science." All such "science" as kills human sympathy and makes human beings hate each other originates in Pandemonium where the Devil is president of the college. And Belial is Professor of "Polical economy."

It is quite evident that some grossly incapable civil engineers are employed to build dams. The huge dam that gave way in Arizona so recently had been built only about eighteen months before and cost nearly a million of dollars. Had a competent engineer been employed to plan the dam and superintend its construction such loss of life and property had not followed its completion so speedily. It would be interesting to know if the engineer of this Arizona dam was well acquainted with the Pacific Coast. Ignorance of the sudden and excessive falls of rain that occur on the Pacific Coast mountain ranges might lead to fatal mistakes in the construction of dams.

The California State Board of Trade recommend that all California east of the Sierra Nevada Mountains unite with the State Board of Nevada in working to promote water storage and irrigation. Our interests are identical in this great matter, and as the Nevada Board has invited us to join with them we should do so at once. It as almost certain that Congress will never appropriate money to build the necessarry works and it is only by States taking hold of the work that anything great can be accomplished.

The whole West rejoices heartily at the victory of Chicago on the fair question. All the California Congressmen voted in favor of Chicago.

A Pretty Little Scene.

A boy carrying a large bouquet of roses, some phlox, heliotrope and pinks entered a Cottage Grove avenue car yesterday. Among the passengers inside was a little girl of possibly 6 years of age. The little one was as pretty a blondinette as one can see, and her woolen dress, spotlessly white, set off her juvenile beauty perfectly. Everybody was admiring the child. No sooner had the flower boy entered than the car was filled with the perfume of the roses and heliotrope. The little girl soon discovered it and quickly gave up her observation from the car window. She approached her mother and began teasing for some of the flowers. Finally when she found out that her mother could not procure any of the much wished for roses the child went right up to the boy.

"Will 'oo dive me tum flowers?" she asked.

The chances were nine to ten that the boy wouldn't give any. But it was, perhaps, because the little girl was so sweetly charming that he detached a couple of handsome red roses and gave them to her. Triumphantly she returned to her mother. The roses were pinned to her bosom. At Twentieth street the boy got off. Quickly the little girl jumped on the seat. But it was on the wrong side from that on which the boy was. She jumped off, went to the other seat, and looked out of the window. She saw the boy, and he, noticing her, waved his hand. Then she, putting her rosy fingers to her mouth, threw him two, three kisses. It was so sweetly, gracefully done. Then she settled down and inhaled her flowers.—Chicago Tribune.

THE LAST LETTER.

Long years within its sepulcher
Of faintly scented cedar
Has lain this letter dear to her
Who was its constant reader;
The postmark on the envelope
Sufficed the date to give her,
And told the birth of patient hope
That managed to outlive her.

How often to this treasure box,
Tears in her eyes' soft fringes,
She came with key, and turned the locks,
And on its brazen hinges
Swung back the quaintly figured lid
And raised a sandal cover,
Disclosing, under trinkets hid,
This message from her lover.

Then lifting it as 't were a child,
Her hand a while caressed it
Ere to the lips that sadly smiled
Tune and again she pressed it;
Then drew the small inclosure out
And smoothed the wrinkled paper,
Lest any line should leave a doubt
Or any word escape her.

Still held the olden charm its place
Amid the tender phrases—
Time seemed unwilling to efface
The love pervaded praises;
And though a thousand lovers might
Have matched them all for passion,
A poet were inspired to write
In their unstudied fashion.

From "Darling" slowly, word by word,
She read the tear stained treasure;
The mists by which her eyes were blurred
Grew out of pain and pleasure;
But when she reached that cherished name,
And saw the last leave taking,
The mist a storm of grief became,
Her very heart was breaking!

Pout it back—this old time note,
Which seems like sorrow's leaven—
For she who read, and he who wrote,
Please God, are now in heaven.
If lovers of today could win
Such love as won this letter,
The world about us would begin
To gladden and grow better.

MR. MAX.

It is like heaven to Greta, this quiet and rest with the dear Frau Merz and all the children, though you or I could see neither among that noisy crew of six—four big boys, then Linchen and Hede, all to be washed, dressed, mended for and taught. But Greta loves children, and then there is Mr. Max.

Mr. Max is Frau Merz's brother, a big ellow haired giant, broad shouldered and kind, who frowns on the children when their spirits grow too high, threatens to lock them up in his big press and call ogres to eat them; who is never too busy to set an easy chair for Greta, pass her the knitting that is always at hand, and smooth all the rough places, till after a while it becomes second nature for Greta to turn to Mr. Max when she wants ything, and again when she gets it.

Frau Merz smiles but says nothing. Greta is a dear, love worthy girl, and will make Max a good wife. It had been a cause for dread that he might love some different girl, who would take him away and break up the sweet home life. Greta is already one of them, and when Max returns from America there will be a quiet wedding, the young people will tettle down near them and all will go on as before.

So it is with a pleased, satisfied smile that Frau Merz greets her brother as he runs up her steps the day before he sails, intent on securing his bride. He tells her she has drawn a pretty picture, but one not easy to paint. The little Greta may refuse him.

Refuse him! refuse Mr. Max! Then the ungrateful little coquette shall go about her business and the dear children grow up dunces! As if such husbands grew on every bush for a little governess to pick—and, much more, till the swallows fly from the windows in terror.

They fly back the next morning to help say good-by to the traveler and see Frau Merz with her arm round Greta's waist—Greta, who is trying to look unhappy, like a well regulated maiden parting from her betrothed. Yes, her betrothed, for there had been a half hour in the schoolroom last night, at the end of which Greta found Max's ring on her finger and his kiss on her lips.

And now Frau Merz is promising to keep the little bride safely till he can return and claim her, and all the while Greta is perfectly sure she does not love Mr. Max half as much as he does her and that she will chiefly miss him when the children are unmanageable.

Frau Merz is very tearful for many days after Max's departure, and often does Greta in her own heart congratulate herself that she does not love Max. Why, she would be worn thin if she laid awake worrying over every wind that blew, and wondering if the ship had not met an iceberg and been wrecked. She never lost a night's sleep—not she. It will be time enough to think about Max when she marries him, as of course she intends to do, but for the present, she is not in love with him, and she is glad of it.

And now he is coming home, and the bride is thinking little of her husband, and much of her pretty clothes, and house linen. Frau Merz has been more than kind; but the generous gifts have been given with a wonder that so much is said of "my house," and so little of "my husband," and just when the thought has made her thoroughly uncomfortable, and disposed to be short with Greta, comes word that the vessel has gone down in sight of land, with all on board.

* * * * * * *

No! that is not the little widowed bride whose sobs are so heartrending. It is Frau Merz, and she is crying her heart out on Greta's shoulder; she is telling every one what a dear brother he was.

"Yes, and you," she says, "have not shed a tear! you did not love him, my poor dead brother!"

"No, I do not love him," says Greta, and goes quietly from the room. Quietly from the room, and quietly into her own, quietly closes the door, looks around, sits quietly down in her arm chair. Max gave her the chair; she must often be tired after teaching. His thoughtfulness was always first for her. In her own home she will have the right to be first. Their own home! Dear heaven! there will be no home —— She sees Max the day he sailed; she hears him say "Good-by, little wife! when I come again I will take you for my own, and we will never be separated again"—— Life with Max, his strong arm between her and every trial! Life alone, to battle for herself against the world, Max's tender admiration of all her hands have done—a stranger's, not Max's kisses.

If Frau Merz could see Greta now. She is face down on the little white bed and her sobs are choking. There is no use living any more; she must be alone all her life. She would have been so proud of Max, his home would have been all that he looked for, and she so true a wife. He would have been so glad to come to her when the day was over; she could see the cozy room in which she would wait for him. She would have on a soft, warm dress, made as he loved, to show her white throat, and he would take her in his arms, hold her close and tell her his life is complete—and, as the years go on, and they stand hand in hand by a cradle —— Oh! it is a girl's happy picture, but drawn on a slate, and a sponge has been passed over it, leaving the slate blank, and wet, so that no other picture can be drawn there. Greta knows her own heart now, and it is desolate.

There are days to be lived through before forgetfulness can come, days that are only miserable intervals between wretched nights, when Greta goes over and over in her mind the past year, and tries to hold on to the happy memories that will slip away from her as sand runs through the fingers.

So the spring time comes. It has been only two months since Max was lost, but oh! how long to Greta! Frau Merz soon finds out how it is with the girl, and every day the two grow more to each other. She begins to take comfort in her children, plans for their summer, and takes some of the good of life. Not so with Greta! there is always an ache at her heart, and a mist over her sunshine. She is in very truth a widow.

One day she is sitting alone (Greta loves to sit alone now, she can better think of Max). There is a sound of feet in the hall, a rush, a cry from Frau Merz, and her Max is at her side—her Max, who was picked up after the wreck by a whaling ship and carried half around the world—her Max, who missed her so, and now holds her close as if he would make up for all he had lost.

And Greta's heart—that learned to know itself only when broken? The healing is all done before the physician has said ever a word.—Translated for Current Literature from the Berlin Tagblatt by Miss J. M. Burgoyne.

COURT NOTES.

Superior Court of Inyo County California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

SATURDAY, March 1st.

John Burns vs. A. K. Briggs et als.—Complaint filed.

MONDAY, March 3d.

In the matter of Elisha Mallory, an Insolvent debtor—Proceedings dismissed.

Vernon Smith was down from Big Pine on Tuesday.

Mr. E. Robinson has returned from his trip to Butte county.

Work is steadily progressing on the river bridge between town and Citrus.

The trial of the Elliott case has been changed from April 25th to May 13th.

Mr. Fred Bulpitt came down from Bishop to see the performance of the Mikado.

A large number of prominent railroad officials were at Los Angeles last week.

H. H. Spear has again gone to Mojave after freight. He took out a load of dried hides.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Meysan of Lone Pine have gone to visit their daughters at Los Angeles.

Mines at Virginia City were compelled to shut down last week because of the snow blockade.

Mr. F. McIver has been in Carson during the week attending a meeting of the stock holders of the Eastside canal.

Mr. N. G. Fairman arrived in town from Panamint last Tuesday. He reports nothing doing in that locality at present.

The Superintendent of the Nevada Missiod will preach at Lone Pine Saturday evening and also Sunday morning at 11 o'clock.

The contractors of the railroad from Salt Lake to Los Angeles recently advertised for men and teams to work on the road.

The Chronicle-Union says that in consequence of the storms in Mono county flour wood and oil were scarce in Bodie, Bridgeport and Lundy. At Bodie sickness prevailed.

It is reported from Bodie that only twelve men are employed in the Lent shaft and that the Standard mine is idle, the new superintendent only taking care of the property.

The Reno Gazette says that property in Virginia City is taxed $5 00 on each $100 of valuation. It might be cheaper for the owners to give the property to the City and State and then rent it.

A bill has been introduced in the Senate providing for the abandonment of certain military reservations; among the rest is Camp Independence, 120 acres, and a wood reserve of 2,560 acres.

P. W. Forbes Esq. was at Independence early in the week. When Pete begins to have his hair oiled and his mustache curled there is ground for suspicion that it is not law alone that brings him to Independence.

A party of six miners left Virginia City last week under contract to work a mine in Arizona. The are to be paid $3 50 a day and will be charged $1 a day for board. I. Prout, an old Comstock miner, is Superintendent.

The borax teams are again on the road hauling from Cone & Trudo's works in Saline Valley to Alvord. The first trip after the recent storms two or three wagons broke down on the way, but the roads are now in good condition ane there will be no more interruption from that cause.

Under-Sheriff Yaney has been roaming over the southern part of the county for a week or more in search of men who are wanted as witnesses in a murder trial in a neighboring county. He got one of the men at Keeler and at last accounts he was on the trail of another.

Mr. M. V. Bronson, who is in charge of the marble quarry, was in town to-day. Mr. Bronson was a Captain in the celebrated Berdan sharpshooters during the war and has been allowed about one thousand dollars due him for back pay during the service. He made out the necessary papers while here.

The farmers and land owners along the line of the 76 canal in Fresno and Tulare counties have bought the canal and the entire system of water works. The district irrigated by the canal contains 135,000 acres and the former owners of the canal charged 50 cents per acre for the use of the water.

N. E. Conklin met with a serious accident on Wednesday. He was driving a young stallion in a cart when the animal became frightened and ran away, smashing the cart. Mr. Conklin was thrown on his head, remaining unconscious some time from the effects of the blow. Dr. Woodin was called and he is now doing well.

The Denver and Rio Grande railway is being changed from a narrow gauge to standard width. A great force of men and teams is employed in the work and it is expected that standard gauge trains will run to Salt Lake City by next June. This, among other causes, will hasten the building of the line from Salt Lake to the Pacific.

At last report the Union shaft at Cerro Gordo was timbered down to a depth of 600 feet. It is said that no timbering will be done below that point at present but that miners will be put to work prospecting for ore on the 600 foot level. Up to this time the present owners of the Cerro Gordo mines have not done any prospecting and all ore taken out since they took possession of the mines was by tributers. The company has already spent a good deal of money getting the mines in repair and may have to spend much more before any profit is left.

Big Pine Jottings.

Regular Correspondence.

Superintendent Andy Fyfe has sunk a shaft 7x9 feet and 75 feet deep on the Liberal mine, Sylvania District, and the vein is all ore matter so far as excavated. The shaft is perpendicular, following the foot wall. He intends to cross-cut the ledge to find what is therein. The ledge at the surface is twenty feet wide and continues so to the depth of 75 feet. All the ore is first grade.

On Sunday last nearly all the citizens of Big Pine assembled at the old school house for the purpose of selecting a committe to view and particularly determine the best route for a wagon road to the Sylvania mines, A. G. McAfee presiding. The following named were appointed as such viewers: S. G. Gregg, D. J. Hessian and Geo. Hall, A finance committee consisting of J. C. Crocker, W. R. Thomas and R. O'Neal were appointed to make arrangements as to expenses of the viewing committee.

Work is being vigorously pushed on the Big Pine canal, which is now completed to within a short distance of the town. The staying qualities of the company cannot be too highly commended. There will be no more freezing weather to delay progress and the work will be finished at an early date.

Nurses on dance nights in Big Pine are total failures for we find infants swimming streams to find Ed. Crocker even in the small hours of the morning.

Big Piners who visited Independence on the 28th pronounced the Mikado a grand success, and the treatment of visitors there all that could be desired.

An enjoyable farewell party was given at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Shaw on Friday evening last, the occasion being the departure of the family to their ranch a few miles southeast of this town.

Dr. S. A. Middleton has come to make his residence among us. For the present he will occupy the premises vacated by the Shaw family.

James Jones is about to move to the Shedd ranch, having leased the same from Judge Hannah. James Herod is to occupy the Jones ranch.

We have sixty-two pupils attending our school. XERXES.

Robbed His Employer.

On the 3rd of last month Mr. James Jenkins met a man near Lone Pine and after a few minutes talk hired him to work upon a farm. The name of the man is Frank Greer; he proved a good worker, giving entire satisfaction to his employer; after the man had been working three weeks Mr. Jenkins had occasion to leave home for a few days and left Greer alone upon the farm. It would appeur that Greer got some wine and after drinking it determined to rob his employer. He searched the house and found one hundred and sixty-five dollars in coin. Taking the money he went to Lone Pine and began drinking and gambling. When he had squandered all the money it appears that he became afraid of being roughly handled and went from the town down to the river and hid there for a day two. Suffering from hunger and cold, and all the misery that follows drunkenness, he came to Independence last Monday, told Sheriff Eldred what he had done and asked to be locked up. When Mr. Jenkins came home and discovered what had been done he came to Independence and stated the case to the District Attorney, who made out a complaint and the man was regularly put under arrest. When brought before the magistrate he confessed his crime, said he had already caused trouble enough and would not make any defense but wanted to have his punishment fixed as soon as possible. He seemed penitent for what he had done and laid the crime to drink.

Greer was brought into court yesterday for preliminary examination. Testimony was taken and he was committed for trial. Bail was fixed at $2,500, in default of which he is now in jail. He said that when arraigned he will plead guilty.

Some Fine Stallions.

Messrs. Holbert & Conger of Iowa have opened a business in Los Angeles for the breeding and sale of the best breeds of horses of all kinds. Mr. Holbert spends four months of each year in Europe buying the best young stallions that can be found. These are shipped to Iowa and after being acclimated as many as are wanted are taken to Los Angeles. The firm will sell at Los Angeles at the same prices that would be charged in Iowa. They send a catalogue containing the names and pedigrees of a lot of first-class stallions of different kinds. They appear to think that fine carriage horses will be the most profitable to raise and of this breed they have some of the best stallions. Horse breeders will do well to correspond with the firm at their address on San Pedro St. between 7th and 8th, Los Angeles.

The Opera.

The Mikado was the best amateur performance ever given at Independence. That it could be presented at all by young people, only one of whom had ever seen it rendered by professionals, was surprising enough; not only was this done, however, but it was done well. The dresses were perfectly gorgeous and the characters well sustained, some of them admirably. By general consent the success of the performance is credited to Miss M. Conklin who took the management and trained the other performers, and Mr. Hiram Hamilter, who rendered meritorious assistance in preparing the hall and stage. Miss A. Kohler as Katisha elicited more applause than any other. Her voice is powerful and her acting superb. There was a crowded audience.

Public Notice.

Three years ago more or less there were left at my place for pasturage two mare colts. After serving notice by mail upon the owner of same to pay charges due on said animals and remove them he has refused or neglected to do so. Public notice is hereby given that unless all just charges are paid on or before the 29th day of March 1890 on said animals, viz., two dark bay mares aged three and four years respectively, the property of one McCormick, I will at 2 o'clock p. m. of said day, at my residence at Camp Independence, Inyo county California, after making the necessary affidavit of the facts herein set forth, sell the above described animals at public sale to the highest bidder for cash and devote the proceeds, or so much thereof as may be necessary, toward paying charges on said animals, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. MRS. M. LEWIS.

Dated March 6, 1890.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutritious juice of California figs, combined with the medicinal virtues of plants known to be most beneficial to the human system, acts gently on the kidneys, liver and bowels, effectually cleansing the sytem, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

William Rowan passed through town yesterday on his way home from Los Angeles. He took out thirty-six head of horses and sold them all. He says the market is dull and sales slow. Mr. Rowan finds that the most salable animals are good draft horses weighing twelve hundred and upward. A span of such animals four years old and over, perfectly sound and free from all blemishes, will sell readily enough for three hundred dollars.

Antimony is used in the manufacture of the lately invented smokeless powder, and the use of that material by the armies of Europe has made such a demand for the metal that the price has increased from 9¼ cents to 31 cents a pound. There are many evidences of antimony ledges in Inyo county and a good mine of it would be valuable property.

OFFICIAL.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

The old gentleman staggered for a moment, and caught at the mantel piece, for the blow was a heavy one, and as unexpected as it was heavy. But he recovered himself in an instant, for it was one of the peculiarities of his character that his spirits always seemed to rise to the occasion in the face of urgent adversity—in short, he possessed an extraordinary share of moral courage.

"Indeed," he said, indignantly, "indeed, it is a pity that you did not tell me that at once, Mr. Quest; it would have saved me from putting myself in a false position by proposing a business arrangement which is not acceptable. As regards the interest, I admit that it is as you say, and I very much regret it. That stupid fellow, George, is always so dreadfully behindhand with his accounts that I can never get anything settled." He did not state, and indeed did not know, that the reason that the unfortunate George was behindhand was that there were no accounts to make up, or rather that they were all on the wrong side of the ledger. "I will have that matter seen to at once. Of course, business people are quite right to consider their due, and I do not blame Messrs. Cossey in the matter, not in the least. Still, I must say that, considering the long and intimate relationship that has for nearly two centuries existed between their house and my family, they might—well—have shown a little more consideration."

"Yes," said Mr. Quest, "I dare say that the step strikes you as a harsh one. To be perfectly frank with you, Mr. de la Molle, it struck me as a very harsh one, but of course I am only a servant, and bound to carry out my instructions. I sympathize with you very much—very much, indeed."

"Oh, don't do that," said the old gentleman. "Of course, other arrangements must be made; and, much as it will pain me to terminate my connection with Messrs. Cossey, they shall be made."

"But I think," went on the lawyer, without any notice of his interruption, "that you misunderstand the matter a little. Cossey & Son are only a trading corporation, whose object is to make money by lending it, or otherwise—at all hazards to make money. The kind of feeling that you allude to, and that might induce them, in consideration of long intimacy and close connection in the past, to forego the opportunity of so doing, and even to run a risk of loss, is a thing which belongs to former generations. But the present is a strictly commercial age, and we are the most commercial of the trading nations. Cossey & Son move with the time, that is all, and they would rather sell up a dozen families which had dealt with them for two centuries than lose five hundred pounds, provided, of course, that they could do so without scandal and loss of general respect, which, where a banking house is concerned, also means a loss of custom. I am a great lover of the past myself, and believe that our ancestors' ways of doing business were, on the whole, better and more charitable than ours; but I have to make my living, and take the world as I find it, Mr. de la Molle."

"Quite so, Quest; quite so," answered the squire, quietly. "I had no idea that you looked at these matters in such a light. Certainly the world has changed a good deal since I was a young man, and I do not think it has changed much for the better. But you will want your luncheon; it is hungry work talking about foreclosures." Mr. Quest had not used this unpleasant word, but the squire had seen his drift. "Come into the next room," and he led the way to the drawing room, where Ida was sitting, reading The Times.

"Ida," he said, with an affectation of heartiness, which did not, however, deceive his daughter, who knew how to read every change of her dear father's face, "here is Mr. Quest. Take him into luncheon, my love. I will come presently. I want to finish a note."

Then he returned to the vestibule, and sat down in his favorite old oak chair.

"Ruined," he said to himself. "I can never get the money as things are, and there will be a foreclosure. Well, I am an old man, and I hope that I shall not live to see it. But there is Ida. Poor Ida—I cannot bear to think of it; and the old place, too, after all these generations—after all these generations!"

CHAPTER X.

THE TENNIS PARTY.

Ida shook hands coldly enough with the lawyer, for whom she cherished a dislike not unmixed with fear. Many women are by nature gifted with an extraordinary power of intuition, which fully makes up for their deficiency in reasoning force. They do not conclude from the premises of their observation, they know that this man is to be feared and that trusted. In fact, they share with the rest of breathing creation that self protective instinct of instantaneous and almost automatic judgment given to guard it from the dangers with which it is continually threatened at the hands of man's overmastering strength and ordered intelligence. Ida was one of them. She knew nothing to Mr. Quest's disadvantage, indeed, she always heard him spoken of with great respect, and, curiously enough, she liked his wife very much. But she could not bear the man, feeling in her heart that he was not only to be avoided on account of his own hidden qualities, but that he was, moreover, an active personal enemy.

They went into the old dining room, where the luncheon was set, and while Ida allowed Mr. Quest to cut her some cold boiled beef—an operation in which he did not seem to be very much at home, she came to a rapid conclusion in her own mind. She had seen clearly enough from her father's face that his interview with the lawyer had been of a most serious character, but she knew that the chances were that she would never be able to get its upshot out of him, for the old gentleman had a curious habit of keeping such unpleasant matters to himself until he was absolutely forced by circumstances to reveal them. She also knew that her father's affairs were in a most critical condition, for that she had extracted from him on the previous night, and if any remedy was to be attempted it must be attempted at once, and on some heroic scale. Therefore, she made up her mind to ask her bete noir, Mr. Quest, what the truth might be.

"Mr. Quest," she said, with some trepidation, as he at last triumphantly handed her the beef, "I hope that you will forgive me for asking you a plain question, and that if you can you will favor me with a plain answer. I know my father's affairs are very much involved, and that he is now anxious to borrow some more money, but I do not know quite how matters stand, and I want to learn the exact truth."

"I am very glad to hear you speak like that, Miss de la Molle," answered the lawyer, "because I was trying to make up my mind to broach the subject, which is a painful one to me. Frankly, then, forgive me for saying it, your father is absolutely ruined. The interest on the mortgages is a year in arrear, his largest farm is just thrown upon his hands, and, to complete the tale, the mortgagees are going to call in their money or foreclose."

At this statement, which was almost brutal in its brief comprehensiveness, Ida turned pale as death, as well she might, and dropped her fork with a clatter upon her plate.

"I did not realize that things were quite so bad," she murmured. "Then I suppose that the place will be taken from us, and we shall—shall have to go away."

"Yes, certainly, unless money can be found to take up the mortgages, of which I see no chance. The place will be sold for what it will fetch, and that nowadays will be no great sum."

"When will that be?" she asked.

"In about six or nine months' time."

Ida's lips trembled, and the sight of the food upon her plate became nauseous to her. A vision arose before her mind's eye of herself and her old father departing hand in hand from the castle gates, behind and about which gleamed the hard wild lights of a March sunset, to seek a place to hide themselves, and the horror of it almost overcame her.

"Is there no way of escape?" she asked, hoarsely. "To lose this place would kill my father. He loves it better than anything in the world; his whole life is wrapped up in it."

"I can quite understand that, Miss de la Molle. It is a most charming old place, especially to anybody interested in the past. But unfortunately, mortgagees are no respecters of feelings. To them land is so much property, and nothing more."

"I know all that," she said, impatiently. "You do not answer my question!" and she leaned toward him and rested her hand upon the table. "Is there no way out of it?"

Mr. Quest drank a little claret before he answered. "Yes," he said, "I think there is, if only you will take it."

"What way?" she asked, eagerly.

"Well, though, as I said just now, the mortgagees of an estate as a body are merely a business corporation, and look at things from a business point of view only, you must remember that they are composed of individuals, and that individuals can be influenced if they can be got at. For instance, Cossey & Son are an abstraction, and harshly disposed in their abstract capacity, but Mr. Edward Cossey is an individual, and I should say, so far as this particular matter is concerned, a benevolently disposed individual. Now, Mr. Edward Cossey is not himself at the present moment actually one of the firm of Cossey & Son, but he is the heir of the head of the house, and, of course, has authority, and, what is better still, the command of money."

"I understand," said Ida. "You mean that my father should try to win over Mr. Edward Cossey. Unfortunately, to be frank, he dislikes him, and my father is not a man to keep his dislikes to himself."

"People generally do dislike those to whom they are crushingly indebted; your father dislikes Mr. Cossey because his name is Cossey, and for no other reason. But that is not quite what I meant. I do not think the squire is the right person to undertake a negotiation of that sort. He is a little too outspoken and incautious. No, Miss de la Molle, if it is to be done at all you must do it. You must put the whole case before him at once, this very afternoon. There is no time for delay. You need not enter into details; he knows all about them; only ask him to avert this catastrophe. He can do so if he likes; how he does it is his own affair."

"But, Mr. Quest," said Ida, "how can I ask such a favor of any man? I shall be putting myself in a dreadfully false position."

"I do not pretend, Miss de la Molle, that it is a pleasant task for any young lady to undertake. I quite understand you shrinking from it. But sometimes one has to do unpleasant things, and make compromises with one's self respect. It is a question whether or no your family shall be utterly ruined and destroyed. There is, as I honestly believe, no prospect whatever of your father being able to get the money to pay off Cossey & Son, and if he did it would not help him, because he could not pay the interest on it. Under these circumstances, you have to choose between putting yourself in an equivocal position and letting events take their course. It would be useless for anybody else to undertake the task, and, of course, I cannot guarantee that even you will succeed; but I will not mince matters, as you doubtless know. Any man would find it hard to refuse a favor asked by such a suppliant. And now you must make up your own mind. I have shown you a path that may lead your family from a position of the most imminent peril. If you are the woman I take you for, you will not shrink from following it."

Ida made no reply.

Ida made no reply, and in another moment the squire came in to take a couple of glasses of sherry and a biscuit. But Mr. Quest, furtively watching her face, said to himself that she had taken the bait, and that she would do it. Shortly after this a diversion occurred, for the clergyman, Mr. Jeffries, a pleasant little man, with a round and shining face and a most unclerical eyeglass, came up to consult the squire upon some matter of parish business, and was shown into the dining room. Ida took advantage of his appearance to effect a retreat to her own room, and there for the present we may leave her to her meditations.

No more business was discussed by the squire that afternoon. Indeed, it interested Mr. Quest, who was above all things a student of character, to observe how wonderfully the old gentleman threw off his trouble. To listen to him energetically arguing away with the Rev. Mr. Jeffries as to whether or no it would be proper, as had hitherto been the custom, to devote the proceeds of the harvest festival collection (£1 18s. 3d. and a brass button) to the county hospital, or whether it should be applied to the repair of the woodwork in the vestry, was, under the circumstances, most instructive. The Rev. Mr. Jeffries, who suffered severely from the condition of the vestry, at last gained his point by triumphantly showing that no patient from Honham had been admitted to the hospital for fifteen months, and that therefore the hospital had no particular claim on this particular year, whereas the draught in the vestry was enough to cut any clergyman in two.

"Well, well," said the old gentleman, "I will consent for this year, and this year only. I have been church warden of this parish for between forty and fifty years, and we have always given the harvest festival collection to the hospital, and although under these exceptional circumstances it may possibly be desirable to diverge from that custom, I cannot and will not consent to such a thing in a permanent way. So I shall write to the secretary and explain the matter, and tell him that next year and in the future generally the collection will be devoted to its original purpose."

"Great heavens!" ejaculated Mr. Quest to himself. "And all the time the man must know that in all human probability the place will be sold over his head before he is a year older. I wonder if he puts it on or if he deceives himself. I suppose he has lived here so long that he cannot realize a condition of things when he will cease to live here and the place will belong to somebody else. Or perhaps he is only brazening it out." And then he strolled away to the back of the house and had a look at the condition of the outhouses, reflecting that some of them would be sadly expensive to repair for whoever came into possession here. After that he crossed the moat and walked through the somewhat extensive plantations at the back of the house, wondering if it would not be possible to get enough timber out of them, if one went to work judiciously, to pay for putting the place in order. Presently he came to a hedgerow where there had been a line of very fine timber oaks of which the squire had been notoriously fond, and of which he had himself taken particular and admiring notice in the course of the previous winter. The trees were gone. In the hedge where they had stood were a series of gaps like those in an old woman's jaw, and about upon the ground were littered remains of bark and branches and of fagots that had been made up of the brushwood.

"Cut down this spring fell!" was Mr. Quest's ejaculation. "Poor old gentleman, he must have been pinched before he consented to part with those oaks."

Then he turned and went back to the house, just in time to see Ida's guests arriving for the lawn tennis party. Ida herself was standing on the lawn in front of the house, which, bordered as it was by the moat and at the further end by a row of ruined arches, was one of the most picturesque in the country, and a very effective setting to any young lady. As the people came they were shown through the house on to the lawn, and here she was receiving them. She was dressed in a plain, tight-fitting gown of blue flannel, which showed off her perfect figure to great advantage, and a broad brimmed hat, that shaded her fine but somewhat dignified face. Mr. Quest sat down on a bench beneath the shade of an arbutus, watching her closely, and, indeed, if the study of a perfect English lady of the noblest sort has any charms, he was not without his reward. There are some women—most of us know one or two—who are born to hold a great position and to sail across the world like a swan through meaner fowl. It would be very hard to say to what their peculiar charm and dignity is owing. It is not to beauty only, for though they have presence, many of these women are not beautiful, while some are even plain. Nor does it spring from native grace and tact alone, though these things must be present. Rather, perhaps, is it the reflection of a cultivated mind acting upon a naturally pure and elevated temperament, which makes these ladies conspicuous, and fashions them in such kind that all men, putting aside the mere charm of beauty and the natural softening of judgment in the atmosphere of sex, must recognize in them an equal mind, and a presence more noble than their own.

Such a woman was Ida de la Molle, and if any one doubted it it was sufficient to compare her in her simplicity to the various human items by whom she was surrounded. They were a typical county society gathering, such as needs no description, and would not greatly interest if described—neither very good nor very bad, very handsome nor very plain, but moving religiously within the lines of custom, and on the ground of commonplace.

It was no wonder, then, that a woman like Ida de la Molle was facile princeps among them, and that Mrs. Quest, but not being of a scandal loving disposition it had not interested her, and she had almost forgotten it. Now, however, she saw that there was something in it.

"So that is the difficult position of which he talks," she said to herself; "he wants to marry me as soon as he can get Mrs. Quest off his hands. And I have consented to that, always provided that Mrs. Quest can be disposed of, in consideration of the receipt of a sum of £30,000. And I do not like the man. It was not nice of him to make that bargain, though I brought it on myself. I wonder if my father will ever know what I have done for him, and if he will appreciate it if he does. Well, it is not a bad price—£30,000—it is a good figure for any woman in the present state of the market." And with a hard and bitter laugh, and a prescience of sorrow to come lying at the heart, she threw down the remains of the scarlet Turk and turned away.

CHAPTER XII.

GEORGE PROPHECIES.

Ida, for obvious reasons, said nothing to her father of her interview with Edward Cossey, and thus it came to pass that on the morning following the lawn tennis party, there was a very serious consultation between the faithful George and his master. It appeared to Ida, who was lying awake in her room, to commence somewhere about daybreak, and it certainly continued, with short intervals for refreshment, till 11 o'clock in the forenoon. First the squire explained the whole question to George at great length, and with a most extraordinary multiplicity of detail, for he began with his first loan from the house of Cossey & Son, which he had contracted a great many years before. All this while George sat with a very long face, and tried to look as though he were following the thread of the argument, which was not possible, for his master had long ago lost it himself, and was mixing up the loan of 1863 with the loan of 1874, and the money raised on the severance of the entail with both in a way which would have driven anybody except George, who was used to this sort of thing, perfectly mad. However, he sat it through; and when at last the account was finished, remarked that things "sartinly did look queer."

Thereupon the squire called him a stupid owl, and having by means of some test questions discovered that he knew very little of the details which had just been explained to him at such portentous length, he, in spite of the protest of the wretched George, who urged that they "didn't seem to be gitting no forrader somehow," began and went though every word of it again.

This brought them to breakfast time, and after breakfast George's accounts were thoroughly gone into, with the result that confusion was soon worse confounded, for either George could not keep accounts or the squire could not follow them. Ida, sitting in the drawing room, could continually hear her father's ejaculatory outbursts after this kind:

"Why, you stupid donkey, you've added it up all wrong; it's 950, not 350," followed by a "No, no, squire, you be a looking on the wrong side—them there are the 'debits,' and so on till both parties were fairly played out, and the only thing that remained clear was that the balance was considerably on the wrong side.

This was the state of affairs, when the door bell rang and Edward Cossey, looking particularly handsome and rather overpowering, was shown into the room.

The squire shook hands with him this time, though coldly enough, and George touched his forelock and said: "Sarvant, sir," in the approved fashion. Thereon his master told him that he might retire, though he was to be sure not to go out of hearing, as he should want him again presently.

"Very well, sir," answered George, "I'll just step up to the poplars. I told a man to be round there today, as I want to see if I can come to an understanding with him about this year's fell in the big wood."

"There," said the squire with an expression of infinite disgust, "there, that's just like your way, your horrid, cadging way; the idea of telling a man to be 'round about the Poplars' some time or other today, because you wanted to speak to him about a fell. Why didn't you write him a letter like an ordinary Christian and make an offer, instead of dodging him round a farm for half a day like a wild Indian? Besides, the Poplars is half a mile off if it's a yard."

"Lord, sir," said George, as he retired, "that ain't the way that folks in these parts like to do business, that ain't. Letter writing is all very well for Londoners and other furriners, but it don't do here. Besides, sir, I shall hear you well enough up there. Sarvent, sir"—this to Edward Cossey—and he was gone.

(To be Continued.)

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs has ordered a favorable report of Hale's bill, providing for the construction of eight battle-ships of large tonnage, two armed coast defense vessels, three gunboats and five torpedo-boats, for which $7,000,000 is appropriated toward their construction and armament.

A Machinist Who Was Made Rich by an Investment of $3.

Edward T. Bellis, the foreman of the Roth Tool Works, corner of Eighteenth and Market streets, is one of the fortunates who held the winning number, 98,455, which drew the capital prize of $600,000 in the December drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery.

Mr. Bellis is a man of family, and is very contented just at present.

A reporter called on him this morning. Mr. Bellis is an expert machinist, and was found examining into the merits of a new invention.

"Mr. Bellis, is it a fact that you won a part of the capital prize in the Louisiana State Lottery drawing for December?"

"I am happy to say that it is a fact. It was a great surprise to me, and the most acceptable Christmas present I ever received in the whole course of my fifty years on earth."

"It was my first speculation in the lottery. I was in need of money, as my health was bad and interfered with my business. I thought I would try the lottery. My wife opposed the action, saying it was all nonsense and that I might as well throw the money away. However, I determined to try, and invested $3, securing three 40-th part tickets.

"I will admit candidly that I was a little anxious to know how I came out, and could hardly wait for the issue of the Star-Sayings containing the list of the winning numbers. When I saw 98,455—$600,000, I looked at one of my tickets. There it was in plain figures. I will say that I didn't eat much breakfast. My wife was a little nervous herself, and I took good notice I didn't get any lecture either. It was my victory. I went to the American Exchange Bank, where I was acquainted, and through it obtained the $15,000. I have the money, and my wife is with me in saying the Louisiana State Lottery is a great and honest institution. If a man's health is ailing he forgets his ailments under the happy anticipation of winning something whether he does or not."—St. Louis (Mo.), Star-Sayings, January 3.

POOR HUMANITY!

The common lot is one of sorrow say—at least—the pessimists, they who look at the worst side. Certainly what would otherwise be a bright existence, is often shadowed by some ailment that overhangs it like a pall, obscuring perpetually the radiance that else would light the path. Such an ailment, and a very common one, is nervousness, or in other words, weakness of the nervous system, a condition only irremediable where inefficient or improper means are taken to relieve it. The concurrent experience of nervous people who have persistently used Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is, that it conquers entirely supersensitiveness of the nerves, as well as diseases—so called—which are invited and sustained by their chronic weakness. As the nerves gain stamina from the great tonic the trouble disappears. Use the Bitters for malaria, rheumatism, billiousness and kidney troubles.

HAPPY RECOVERY.

There is nothing I now enjoy that I do not owe to having used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy. of Rondout, N. Y., at a time when I was suffering all that a human being could endure. My troubles began in my kidneys, from which I never expected to recover. My physicians said I had Bright's disease. Later I had a bad attack of Gravel. Six years ago last June—how well I remember that day—I saw Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy advertised in our paper. After using three bottles I was well. I have never had a return of the disease, and though I am over sixty years of age I am vigorous and strong, as I was in my prime. What physicians and the many remedies I had taken could not do Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy did; it stayed the disease and made me a well woman.—Mrs. Emiline P. Mizner, Burg Hill, O.

The Oldest Medicine in the World is probably
DR. ISAAC THOMPSON'S CELEBRATED EYE-WATER.

This article is a carefully prepared physician's prescription, and has been in constant use for nearly a century. There are few diseases to which mankind are subject more distressing than sore eyes, and none, perhaps, for which more remedies have been tried without success. For all external inflammation of the eyes it is an infallible remedy. If the directions are followed it will never fail. We particularly invite the attention of physicians to its merits. CATARRH, HAY FEVER, CATARRAL DEAFNESS.--A NEW HOME TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on application by A. H. Dixon & Son, 337 and 339 West King St., Toronto, Canada.—Scientific American.

THE SEA-SERPENT AGAIN.

A sea-serpent, 103 feet long, covered with silvery, shining scales, and having embryo wings on its shoulders, was seen to coil itself up in slippery folds on the coast of Florida last month. Three reliable persons saw this creature distinctly. After rolling and twisting its bulky form around on the beach for a few minutes, it slipped off into the water and disappeared in the east, followed by a path of foam which could be seen for an hour afterwards.

Reader, the above is a "yarn." If people would believe the following truthful statement as readily as they swallow sea-serpent stories, it would be the means of saving thousands of lives. The statement which we desire to make in the most emphatic manner, is, that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, if taken in time and given a fair trial, will actually cure consumption of the lungs, which is really scrofulous disease of the lungs. If this wonderful medicine don't do all we recommend, when taken as directed, we will cheerfully and promptly return all money paid for it. Can any offer be more generous or fair? No other medicine possesses sufficient power over that fatal malady—Consumption, to warrant its manufacturers in selling it under such trying conditions. The "Golden Medical Discovery" is not only the most wonderful alterative, or blood-cleanser, known to medical science, but also possesses superior nutritive and tonic, or strength-giving, properties which assist the food to digest and become assimilated, thus building up both strength and flesh. For all cases of Bronchial, Throat and Lung Diseases, accompanied with lingering coughs, it is absolutely unequaled as a remedy. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Short Breath, Consumptive Night-sweats, and kindred affections, it surpasses all other medicines. World's Dispensary Medical Association, Proprietors, No. 663 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

$500 OFFERED for an incurable case of Catarrh in the Head by the proprietors of DR. SAGE'S CATARRH REMEDY.

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRH.—Headache, obstruction of nose, discharges falling into throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; eyes weak, ringing in ears, deafness, difficulty of clearing throat, expectoration of offensive matter; breath offensive; smell and taste impaired, and general debility. Only a few of these symptoms likely to be present at once. Thousands of cases result in consumption, and end in the grave.

By its mild, soothing, antiseptic, cleansing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Remedy cures the worst cases. This infallible remedy does not, like the poisonous irritating snuffs, "creams" and strong caustic solutions with which the public have long been humbugged, simply palliate for a short time, or drive the disease to the lungs, as there is danger of doing in the use of such nostrums, but it produces perfect and permanent cures of the worst cases of Chronic Catarrh, as thousands can testify. "Cold in the Head" is cured with a few applications. Catarrhal Headache is relieved and cured as if by magic. By druggists, 50 cents.

QUEER COURTSHIP.

How the Young Men of Cape Breton Woo and Win Their Wives.

Courtship is by no means a necessary preliminary to marriage. To begin at the beginning: When a young man decides that he will marry, he often first builds a house; and it is no trivial matter here, where most of the lumber is sawn by hand in a pit. A man may be said to be in earnest when he begins his suit with months of such hard labor—and that, too, from a disinterested motive, not having the faintest idea, perhaps, as to who will be the mistress of the house. We saw a number of such expectant buildings, in all states and of many ages; for some, failing to get a tenant, stood without windows or doors, the image of a desolate and empty heart. John ——, a young man duly prepared and determined to marry, had set out the previous week with his spokesman to get a wife. He had no particular preference for any one, but they decided to go first to the house of Mary ——, one of the brightest girls of the parish, whom he had often noted, but with whom he had never spoken. When they entered the house, a hint of their object was given to Mary, and she retired from the sitting-room. The spokesman then delivered his speech, in which he praised the personal qualities, the fortune, the social position, of his friend, and asked the hand of Mary for him. As the father had no objection to the offer, he at once consented to leave the matter to his daughter. She was called in, and the spokesman conferred quietly awhile with her in a corner, and she consented to the marriage. The spokesman then led her out to the middle of the floor, and John came from his corner and took her by the hand; thus the "contract" was accepted, under the usual penalty of forfeiting twenty dollars in case the engagement was broken. The evening was spent in dancing; but if any of the deacons had had wind of the affair, it is probable that they would have come and changed the festivity into a prayer-meeting.

The young man afterward engaged the priest to publish the banns for the first and last time on the following Sabbath. But Mary had her own plans in all this: she knew that the affair would reach the ears of Sandy ——, for whom she had a strong preference, and perhaps bring him promptly to a proposal. Sandy did come, and the upshot of it was that he and his father went late on Saturday night, roused the priest, and had Sandy's name substituted in the banns for that of applicant number one.

This new shuffling of the cards was common enough, so that it caused but a passing smile among the friends of the parties most interested. But a certain young man who heard the banns went home in such depression that he asked his father for ten dollars. When questioned, he explained that the girl whom he had always intended to marry was to become the bride of Sandy ——, and he was going away to the States. "Well, and why don't ye carry her off and marry her yersel', Malcolm? I'll give ye the upper farm this minute. Go, get yer brother, see the girl and bring her home here. We'll keep her safe." Now, it happened that Malcolm was the richest of the three applicants, besides being, I will suppose for charity's sake, a good fellow. Suffice it to say that they brought the girl home bag and baggage, by stealth, that Sunday night, and mounted a guard that prevented the success of any strategem on either her part or the part of others, and they were married on the following Tuesday.

These persons were by no means of the lower ranks; the girl was described to me by an old fisherman as a "noble-minded lookin' girl, sir; a fine specimen of the Highland craft." A man is all the more highly esteemed for such a feat. The rejected fellow does not lose heart; he generally keeps on with his negotiations, day after day, house after house, until he finds a partner. An intelligent woman, while admitting the general predominance of worldly interests in these matters, and the suddenness with which marriages were very often made, said that unhappy families are nevertheless rare among this people.

The domestic life of the couple even to-day in most of the peasants' homes will be exceedingly primitive; the woman will do the spinning, weaving and knitting required by the family; and the man will make nearly every thing needed in the house and on the farm. A farm and family will require about two hundred dollars' worth of feed, food and sundries, and this amount represents the average production of the little farms of Cape Breton, together with the fishing that many do at odd times. In the spring, actual want is sometimes felt by many families until fishing begins and the cows give milk once more. But the island is generally free from paupers.—C. H. Farnham, in Harper's Magazine.

Not so Cheap, After All.

"Ah!" said Gilhooly, yesterday morning, "I've done one good act."

"Sent a barrel of flour to the poorhouse?" asked Murphy.

"Better than that. I've just told Jones, who don't stand a ghost of a show, that he will be nominated for the Senate by acclamation."

"Well, that is one of those kindnesses that does a great deal of good and don't cost any thing," replied Murphy.

"The mischief it don't cost any thing. I borrowed two dollars from him on the strength of it," replied Gilhooly.—Texas Siftings.

—Mr. Osborn, the only cocoanut planter in the United States, has received by ship from Africa 150,000 cocoanuts. These are to be planted this year along a strip of sea coast many miles in length, down toward the southernmost point of Florida.

—England thinks its Parliamentary elections take up too much time. The recent elections spread over three weeks. The movement which has been started seeks the enactment of a law by which the elections shall be finished in two days at the longest.

FOREIGN GOSSIP.

—Sir Edward Guinness has donated $1,000,000 for the erection of dwellings for the laboring poor of London.

—A yellow book issued at Pekin gives the population of China proper in 1887 as 303,241,969, which was a gain of 1,164,885 over the year before.

—Phonographs are to be put in the post-offices of Mexico, to be used by persons unable to write, in order to send messages to friends through the mails.

—Paris is surrounded by ramparts twenty-seven miles long. Within these the river Seine, which divides the city, curves and doubles until there are seven miles of it. It is crossed by twenty-seven bridges.

—Queensland, the youngest of the Australian Colonies, is three times as large as France and nearly six times as large as the United Kingdom; yet it contains a population of less than 400,000.

—The English statistics give a notable decrease in their convict population during the last twenty years. The total number of convicts under sentence of penal servitude was 6,405 in July; twenty years ago it was 11,660.

—According to an official statement, the population of Chili, partly estimated, is 3,115,815. This includes 87,007 foreigners and about 50,000 Indians. Santiago has 189,332 inhabitants; Valparaiso, 104,952.

—King George of Greece is an inveterate walker and is a familiar figure on the streets of Athens. The Athenians salute him politely as they meet or pass him, but make no other demonstration, and he simply raises his low felt hat.

—The Shah has ordered a globe which is probably unique in its way. The various countries of the globe are represented by precious stones—France by sapphires, Russia by diamonds, and England by rubies, while emeralds will figure as the various oceans and seas.

—Ancient Rome received from without well nigh seven times the volume of water now poured into modern Rome. This city is the best supplied with water in the world. Next to Rome, Vienna is said to be the most favored capital, if not in the abundance, at least in the purity of its drinking-water.

—The Crown Prince of Brazil was the last royal personage to receive the golden rose from the Pope. The Pope sends this auriferous blossom to those whom he delights to honor, whom the world sometimes does not delight to honor. Queen Isabella of Spain, also an exile, has the golden rose likewise.

—During a recent discussion of the German patent laws in the Reichstag it was revealed that last year Germany granted only 3,921 patents, against England's 9,779 and the United States 20,420. While in most civilized countries the number of patents annually granted is increasing, or, at least, not decreasing, the number in Germany has fallen off 927 in the last five years.

—The redecoration of the famous corridor in Windsor Castle has been completed at a cost of many thousands of pounds. The work has been constantly in progress all the year except when the Queen has been at the castle. One set of rose china, in a single one of the cabinets in this corridor, is valued at £30,000 ($150,000). At the upper end of the corridor is a bust of Gordon, close to which is his pocket Bible inclosed in crystals.

—The lash has never been abolished as a means of discipline in penal institutions of Germany. Generally they use a thong twenty inches long, fastened to a handle a yard long. The lash is thickest at the end. The thickness varies according to the provinces. But the smallest lashes are two inches thick. Only in Saxony are the dimensions fixed by law, the handle there being thirty inches long and the lash thirty-six inches. The maximum number of blows is left to the judgment of the prison directors, but it must not exceed twenty-five in Mecklenburg and Oldenburg, thirty in Saxony and sixty in Prussia.

EUROPE'S SOVEREIGNS.

Only Four of Them Have Sound Minds in Sound Bodies.

A wail comes from Berlin concerning the unhealthiness and unhappiness of the present rulers of Europe.

First, the Czar is hypochondriacal and terribly shaky in the nerves. The Czarina is even worse, and is subject to attacks of intense nervous prostration. The Emperor of Austria is a healthy but a heartbroken, man, and the Empress is a martyr to sciatica, rheumatic fever and melancholia. She belongs to the Wittelsbach family, who produced other samples of royal misery in the demented Kings of Bavaria. The King of Wurtemberg is said—by North Germans, at any rate—to be more than half crazy; King Milan of Servia is haunted day and night by the dread of assassination; and, lastly, the Sultan can not enjoy a moment's peace because he expects to meet the fate of his predecessor. Three more miserable men, they say, can not be found in all Europe than the Czar, the Sultan and King Milan.

The German Emperor's physical defects, again, are well known. The King of Holland is paying the penalty of violent liberties taken with a naturally strong constitution, and has now sunk into the dotage of an irritable invalid. The King of Italy suffers from chronic gastric derangement, brought on by excessive smoking of green cigars. The infant King of Spain has no constitution at all, for his father ruined his by excesses, and was only kept alive latterly by opiates and champagne. The King of the Belgians is lame. The Queen of Roumania is haunted by hallucinations, which sympathetically effect King Charles. In truth, it is a grim and ghastly list; and of all the sovereigns in Europe only Queen Victoria and the Kings of Denmark, Sweden and Greece seem to be blessed with sound minds in sound bodies. To complete the list, it should be added that the late King of Portugal had been a most unhealty and unhappy man for nearly thirty years, as he had never had a month's respite from illness of one sort or another since 1860.—London World.

FIRESIDE FRAGMENTS.

—Give children oranges before breakfast and thus pleasantly anticipate the use of sulphur as a spring medicine.

—Salt pork sprinkled with red pepper bandaged around the throat is an excellent counter-irritant for diphtheritic sore throat.

—It is said that roaches may be exterminated if a powder thoroughly mixed, consisting of thirty-seven parts of borax, nine parts of starch and four parts of cocoa is liberally sprinkled in the cracks and corners of their rendezvous.

—Spiced Cranberries: Wash and carefully pick over four pounds of cranberries; add to them one pint of vinegar, four pounds of sugar, one-half a cupful of molasses, one teaspoonful of cinnamon and one of cloves, half a teaspoonful of allspice; boil one hour.

—Glazed Ham: Boil a ham and remove the skin; wash the surface with a beaten egg; moisten one cupful of powdered crackers thoroughly with milk; add one teaspoonful of melted butter, and work the whole to paste; spread this evenly and thickly over the ham; brown delicately in a slow oven.—Albany Journal.

—Prescription for treatment of Russian influenza, or grip, published by the New York Board of Health: Spray the affected membrane with a ten per cent. solution of quinine, freely and frequently, and take four or five times a day a pill made as follows: Quinine, three grains; camphor, one-half grain; extract of belladonna, one-fourth grain.

—The dyeing of feathers and hair is effected by first cleaning the feathers or hair before dyeing, or bleaching, if necessary, by lukewarm soda-water—one part soda and one hundred and twenty parts water. For dyeing, all neutral dye-stuffs suitable for wool-dying are employed in the same manner as for that fiber.

—Egg Sandwich: Take the hard-boiled yelks of twelve eggs, two ounces of butter, two ounces of anchovy sauce, and salt and cayenne to taste. Pound all together in a mortar until it becomes the consistence of paste, and then spread in the usual manner between thin, triangular slices of well-buttered bread. This preparation will keep fresh for some time.

—The temperature of milk is of great importance to all persons. Hot liquid stimulates every digestive agency, and cold liquid has the reverse effect. That is the whole secret of hot water cure or custom, and it applies with particular force to milk. There is much in that for the stomach to digest, and therefore it needs to be assisted rather than hampered.—Boston Globe.

—Regularity in the hours of meals can not be too strongly insisted on. The stomach should not be disappointed when it expects to be replenished. If disappointed, even a diminished amount of food will be taken without appetite, which causes the secretions to injure the stomach, or else impair its muscular action. Any changes in the time of meals should be made gradually.—Medical Journal.

—Good Lights: During the long, winter evenings, nothing except cheerful companionship adds more to the attractiveness of home than good lights. Even where gas is in the house, many people prefer the light of a lamp to read or work by. Hanging lamps are the best if there are small children in the house, as they very much lessen the danger of any accident happening. To insure a good light, the lamp must be kept clean, both chimney and burner, and filled and properly trimmed. The only right time to attend to this is in the morning. Have the chimneys bright and shining, and the holes in the burner kept open to admit air.—The Home.

SHOOTING STARS.

How They Travel Toward the Earth and Perish in Streaks of Splendor.

A small body, perhaps as large as a paving stone or larger, more often perhaps not so large as a marble, is moving round the sun. Just as a mighty planet revolves in an ellipse, so this small object will move round and round in an ellipse, with the sun in the focus. There are at the present moment inconceivable myriads of such meteors moving in this manner. They are too small and too distant for our telescopes, and we can never see them except under extraordinary circumstances. At the time we see the meteor it is usually moving with enormous velocity, so that it often traverses a distance of more than twenty miles in a second of time. Such a velocity is almost impossible near the earth's surface; the resistance of the air would prevent it.

Aloft, in the emptiness of space, there is no air to resist the meteor. It may have been moving round and round the sun for thousands, perhaps for millions of years, without let or hindrance; but the supreme moment arrives and the meteor perishes in a streak of splendor. In the course of its wanderings the body comes near the earth, and within a few hundred miles of its surface, of course, begins to encounter the upper surface of the atmosphere with which the earth is inclosed. To a body moving with the appalling velocity of a meteor a plunge into the atmosphere is usually fatal. As the meteor rushes through the atmosphere the friction of the air warms its surface, it becomes red hot, then white hot, and is finally driven off into vapor with a brilliant light, while we on earth, one hundred or two hundred miles below, exclaim, "O, look, there is a shooting star!"—Albany Journal.

Killed His Sweetheart.

A boy only twelve years old had found in the streets of Madrid a one-hundred-peseta bank note and changed it at a money changer's, and divided the spoils with another boy, eleven years old. He then bought a pistol and bullets, and then began a quarrel with his playmate about a little girl twelve years of age, the daughter of a well-to-do grocer, whom he called his sweetheart, and whom he accused of showing a preference for his companion. As they were discussing the matter they happened to meet the girl with her female servant, and the older boy deliberately aimed at her and shot her dead in a fit of jealousy. Both boys were sent to jail, and despite his comrade's and the maid servant's testimony, the accused says the pistol went off accidentally.—London Daily News.

FOOD FOR DOGS.

How Canines Should be Fed—Views of An Experienced Breeder.

The puppy, when just weaned, should be fed four, five or even six times a day, and from two months to four months of age, four times; after that three times, to the age of nine to twelve months, according to the breed—the smaller varieties reaching maturity soonest; after that twice a day is enough, a full meal being given each time, until maturity is reached. Regularity as to time is important in feeding, both because it assists health and is a considerable help in inculcating orderly and cleanly habits. Minute calculations have been made as to the amount of food required by a dog, with the result of conflicting statements of opinion, ranging from one-twentieth to one-twelfth of his own weight per day, and it is often stated in this form—one ounce of food for every pound the dog weighs. Experience convinces me that in the matter of quantity of food the scales are better dispensed with, using instead the dog's appetite as the correct measure; I therefore always advise that a dog should have as much at a meal as he will eat freely, and that when he stops to turn it over and pick out bits here and there, the dish should be removed.

The composition and quality of food is the next point claiming consideration. In reference to the first point I think it necessary to refer to theories propounded by Dr. Billings, V. S., of Boston, Mass., in two lectures delivered in this city, and reproduced with apparent approval by that section of the American press which specially deals with canine matters. I have not the text before me, so can not quote with verbal accuracy; but briefly stated, Dr. Billings, founding his argument on the admitted fact that the dog is a carnivorous animal, declared he should be fed entirely on flesh and even went so far as to say that farinaceous food was poison to the dog. The English practice for centuries—from the time of that excellent huntsman and discourser on dogs and their treatment, Edmund de Langley, of the early part of the fourteenth century, confirmed by such practical writers as Turberville and Gervase Markham, of the sixteenth, Cox, Jacobs and others, of the seventeenth, and all the masters of hounds, huntsmen, game-keepers, kennel-men and every other person who has kept a dog since—is dead against Dr. Billings' theory, which, indeed, should rather be named a "crochet." For dogs there is no more wholesome food than the mixed scraps from the table, consisting of meat, bones, bread and vegetables, and when there are more dogs kept than there are bones and scraps for, the broken victuals should be taken as the standard of the component parts of that which has to be further provided.

In regard to pet dogs kept by ladies, the great mistake often made is to overfeed and feed too richly. It is a mistaken kindness to feed dogs on rich, fat-producing diet; and to give sugar and sweet cakes and puddings is to certainly destroy the powers of the digestive and assimilative organs; and any thing that produces excessive fatness will bring on asthma, to which disease pugs and other short-faced pets are especially prone. Occasionally we meet with, in all breeds, a dog that is a dainty feeder. These have to be coaxed to eat, a little at a time being given, and a tonic of iron and quinine with gentian given daily for a week or two at a time.—Hugh Dalziel, in Harper's Magazine.

CAULIFLOWER CULTURE.

A Crop That Pays Several Hundred Dollars Per Acre.

There has, undoubtedly, been more money made by the cultivation of the cauliflower, acre per acre, than by any other vegetable yet discovered, and to-day it is a crop that will pay the cultivator several hundred dollars per acre.

The early crop, like that of all other vegetables, is the most profitable, but as this will require the use of cold frames, hot beds or hot houses, I shall not treat of it in this article. There are only two kinds of cauliflowers that are reliable, though in all seed catalogues you will find from five to twenty different kinds. After several fair trials, I found that Henderson's Early Snowball was the surest header, with the Erfurt second. As the seed is very expensive—six dollars per ounce—I would advise the beginner not to buy more than an ounce at first; a fifty-cent package will do in most cases, and it has enough seeds in it to raise several hundred plants.

Cauliflowers will grow upon almost all good soil, but I find that they thrive best upon a light, rich, sandy loam. Prepare your seed-bed as early in spring as convenient, and be sure that it is fully enriched by manures. Commercial fertilizer, as a general rule, is of very little use for this purpose, as it has a tendency to too rapid growth to suit the plant, making it spindling, and therefore almost useless. For all my seed beds, I have at least three inches of well rotted manure forked into the soil, and then they are thoroughly raked with a fine-tooth iron rake, taking out every stone and pebble and every lump of soil.

Plant cauliflower seeds from the middle of April to the middle of May, being careful to sow them and cover lightly. When the plants are four or five inches high, which will be a month or five weeks after the planting of the seed, set them out in rows three feet apart, and two feet apart in the row for the Snowball; for the Erfurt, three feet by three feet should be the distance.

As the cauliflower is a rank grower, it will need plenty of good manure (the more the better), not less than twenty-five or thirty tons per acre. For my early crop, I put on at least seventy-five tons per acre of the best horse manure I can get, and it pays, too. If you use commercial fertilizer, do not use less than fifteen hundred pounds per acre, and plow it under the same as you would manure. Commercial fertilizers when only harrowed in, are of not much benefit to plants that are set out, for, of necessity, their roots are below the fertilizer at the very start.

Cultivate every ten days or so with cultivator and hoe, at least twice before the plants have set for heads; be careful when hoeing to always loosen the soil around the plant.

Watch your plants closely and be ready to bleach them when they head, for therein lies the value of the cauliflower. A pure white head, as a general rule, is worth more than two "off color." There are several methods of bleaching cauliflowers, but the best, I think, is to pin the leaves closely over the head with a common butcher skewer; they are very cheap and will last a life-time if saved when the cauliflower is cut. The proper time for pinning the leaves over is when the head has burst through the covering made by the smallest of the inside leaves. The bleaching leaves of the cauliflowers are the largest inside leaves; the outside leaves are about useless for this purpose, and like the cabbage leaf, are the better for being cut off. This pinning can not be all done at once, for the plants will not all head at once. It is better, I think, to go through the whole patch every other day and pin up the heads that are advanced enough.

When the cauliflowers are ready for shipping, which will be in a week or ten days after pinning, cut the head from the stalk so at to leave all the leaves, trim the leaves about an inch above the head, and if cauliflowers are bringing a fair price, say eight or ten cents per head—fifteen to fifty cents are the general price, but like all vegetables prices vary with the season—wrap them in white tissue paper, as this will generally increase their value two or three cents a head. Use sugar barrels for shipping, if convenient; if not, any crate or barrel will do. Lay the heads on their sides; butts out; cover barrel with old bagging, or any stout material. Fifteen to twenty heads of cauliflowers will fill a barrel, so if you raise an acre of them, you want plenty of barrels to pack them in. Should there be any undeveloped heads at the approach of frost, pull them out of the ground, allowing the soil to cling to the roots, and place in a cool, light cellar; this should be done when the plants are perfectly dry, and in a few weeks they, too, will be ready for shipping and will pay a great deal better that those sold from the field.—Cor. Country Gentleman.

SALT AND TEETH.

Common Salt a Main Factor in the Destruction of Human Teeth.

Though not disposed to take a "rabid" view of the use of salt, it is safe to say that it is used greatly in excess in many families. As an excuse for this intemperance, it is asserted that animals must have it, therefore it is wholesome for human beings. Lest any one should be encouraged in the excessive use, I will say that the animals, as a whole, do not use it so far as we know. Does any one know of any wild animal, aside from the deer, the horse, the ox and their kinds that ever use it? Does the lion, the carnivora in general, the fishes, the swarms of the insect tribes, the fowls, the worms and reptiles in general? It is known that the North American Indians, the people of Alaska, do not, while it is stated, on good authority, that the vast herds of wild cattle at the Southwest, do not use it, while ultraists claim that there is no evidence that the deer, in visiting the "licks" are there for salt any more than for lime. The most that we claim in this regard is that its use is medicinal, only taken at certain intervals, not steadily as we use it, in part from the force of habit.

But it was my particular object to quote the remarks of Dr. E. Parmley Brown, at a recent dental association. On its influence over the teeth, he says:

"I will venture the assertion that the excessive use of common salt is one of the main factors in the destruction of human teeth to-day. I am now engaged in collecting some statistics on this point from which I hope in time to demonstrate what seems to me to be the fact, that common salt, excessively used, is a great solvent to the human teeth. If it will injure the human teeth through the chemistry of our systems, in some way or other, that I shall not try explain to-night, why might it not also have the effect of preventing a good development of the teeth when taken into the system in excess? I have lately procured some statistics from the Sandwich Islands from a gentleman who has been there, covering a period of over forty years, that are very suggestive and interesting. Within that period the teeth of the Sandwich Islanders have decayed rapidly, and since they have begun to decay, it has been noticed that the natives are in the habit of biting off chunks of salt, and eating it with their food. According to all accounts, the teeth of the Sandwich Islanders were formerly the most free from decay of any of the people on the face of the earth, if I remember rightly. You will find that people who eat a great deal of salt and a great deal of sugar are often entirely toothless. People who eat an excessive amount of salt are tempted to eat large quantities of candy, pickles and vinegar. There seems to be a craving for those substances after the excessive use of salt."—Dr. Hanaford, in Golden Rule.

—A gentleman who had carefully trained up his servant in the way he should go, so that when his wife was present, he might not depart from it, sent him with a box-ticket for the theater to the house of a young lady. The servant returned when the gentleman and wife were at dinner. He had, of course, been told in giving answers in certain cases to substitute the masculine for the feminine pronoun. "Did you see him?" asked the master. "Yes, sir," replied the servant. "He said he'd go with pleasure, and that he'd wait for you, sir." "What was he doing," asked the wife carelessly. "Putting on his bonnet, ma'am," said the idiot.—N. Y. Post.

THE FUSSING OF WOMEN.

Many Wives Sink Beneath the Burden of Daily Commonplaces.

Men generally laugh at what they term "fussing" on the part of women, or, in other words, any mention before them or discussion of household duties. And yet all is to be perfection, particularly the "cuisine;" the "Julienne soup" is to be worthy of a French cafe, the "cotelettes a la soubise" irreproachable. It is true that they retain their privilege—as Englishmen—of grumbling; but that is, as a rule, all the help they are willing to give a woman in domestic matters. Till people have done a thing themselves they always underrate the labor that it requires to do it efficiently. "It looks so easy, it can not take so long," is said as often by men and women as by children. The next time that Lady Clara Vere de Vere goes to Ascot, it might add to her experience of life if she were on one occasion to pack her own boxes. She would, perhaps, by means of that experience better understand the look given her by her maid (of indignant mortification) when she decides at the last moment to change her traveling dress for one that is reposing at the bottom of her trunk. The law of the Medes and Persians will not suit an English household—a system that works well for a few months is not necessarily good for all time. A change of household often involves to the woman as much trouble and annoyance as a change of Ministry to a country. Nor must it be believed that because a household is numerous and a woman has many servants under her command she can, to quote the vulgar phrase, "be quite a lady," loll on a sofa all day, and read a novel.

"Too many cooks spoil the broth," and often, with their discussions, recriminations and quarrels, much more time is lost and wasted by the cooks than was required for the actual making of the soup. John Stuart Mill, in his "Sujection of Women," speaks of the many and various duties of a woman, and compares her life "to an interrupted sentence." Many women sink beneath the fretting burden of daily commonplaces and trivial duties. Lord Lytton, in one of his novels, writes: "How many Hampdens and Miltons are killed by the atmosphere of a drawing room!" How many more Brontes and "George Eliots" are destroyed by the load of conventional life! Nobody looks on a woman's time as sacred. Who ever heard of a woman's study in any country house? A man may be the most bucolic of mortals, or only happy in the company of his dogs and gamekeeper, yet courtesy confers upon his private apartment the epithet of "study," and his leisure is always considered sacred. Insufficiency is no longer considered a mark of ladylike refinement. Even Princesses in these days would not be considered musicians if they could not play better than the Princess of Hans Andersen's story. The knowledge of what is really good in art or music no longer belongs to a coterie.—Nineteenth Century.

WASTED STRENGTH.

Calculation of the Force Expended by a Man Who Climbs a Hill.

The physical energy or force sometimes exerted by the human body under certain conditions is known to be astounding, but no one has ever taken the trouble to put before us that force in figures. Dr. J. Buchheister has now made a most interesting calculation on the "work done" by mountaineers in ascending heights, which will serve as an illustration. Supposing a mountaineer weighing 168 pounds is making the ascent of a summit 7,000 feet high from the point of starting, he has to expend an amount of physical force found by multiplying his weight by the height to be ascended. In the case assumed a weight of 168 pounds x a height of 7,000 feet = 1,176,000 foot-pounds; or, in other words, 1,176,000 pounds have to be lifted 1 foot,

This is work performed merely by the muscles of the legs; but, besides this, the contractions of the muscle of the heart have to be taken into account. Its function consists, as is well known, in propelling the blood collecting in the heart, on the one hand, into the arteries, and, on the other, into the lungs. This is effected at an initial velocity of 1½ feet per second, which represents in the case of an adult a work of 4 foot-pounds for each contraction of the heart. The pulsations of an adult are on the average 72 per minute, but in ascending heights, owing to the additional exertion, their number is increased to an extraordinary extent.

Assuming for the sake of simplicity in calculation, only 100 beats of the pulse per minute, this would give 400 foot-pounds per minute, 24,000 foot-pounds per hour, and 120,000 foot-pounds for the five hours supposed to be required in ascending a height of 7,000 feet. The work performed by the muscles in breathing, by the expansion and contraction of the chest, may also be estimated at 4 foot-pounds. Assuming, further, that the number of breathings per minute is on the average only twenty-five, although as a matter of fact it will be found to be higher in a mountain ascent lasting five hours, we have to add further work of 30,000 foot-pounds.

The total work performed during five hours by a mountaineer consequently amounts to 1,326,000 foot-pounds. In this estimate are not included the physical force spent in overcoming the friction on the ground, the exertions to be made in keeping the body erect at dizzy heights and in dragging heavy boots and foot-irons, nor the loss of muscle power in cutting steps in the ice, not to reckon the work performed in carrying an ice axe, or the physical force exerted in crossing fresh, loose snow. Taking all these conditions into account, Dr. Buchheister arrives at the conclusion that the work done in an ascent of 7,000 feet, lasting five hours, can not be placed at less than 1,380,000 foot-pounds.—Iron.

TURKOMAN RAIDS.

Robbery on a Gigantic Scale Carried on Under Allah's "Protection."

The raiding of the Turkomans was essentially a slave-dealing system, founded on the assumption of a right of property in human flesh and blood. Men, women and children were carried off to Khiva and Bokhara, thus placing the impassable desert between them and their homes, so that escape was all but impossible—this security producing a corresponding value in the slave market of these places.

These predatory excursions were known as "chapows" by the Persians, and as "alamans" by the Turkomans. The number of men engaged in one of them depended much on the character of the leader: if he had a previous reputation for success in such expeditions, large numbers would flock to him when a new raid was projected; at times as many as five or six thousand men would engage in one of these expeditions. Horses were put under a peculiar diet and training to fit them for the necessary endurance, for it must be understood that the Turkoman's horse formed the essential part of the raider, where long rides and sudden surprises were the main tactics of the game. As the Thugs of India converted their system of murder into a kind of worship, so the Ishans, or Mohammedan mollahs, gave a religious sanction to the foray by blessing it before starting. At first the "alaman" would move slowly across the desert; but as soon as the Persian frontiers was passed, it made long and stealthy marches by unfrequented routes, avoiding all large towns, till the selected district was reached. Small parties were then detached; these in the dusk of the early dawn crept under the cover of hollows or rising ground toward villages, on which they came down with a lightning sweep, so as to catch the men or women at work in the fields, or by the surprise to seize the cattle before they could be driven in. Men, women, and children, as well as horses, cattle, and sheep, were all fish to the Turkoman's net, and whatever was taken they carried off to the main body of the alaman, who guarded the plunder while the detachments carried on the work. If a village could be taken, then every living thing in it became spoil; whatever the robber's horse could carry, or whatever could be forced to move on its own legs, was borne away. Young girls—if they were pretty—and children were looked upon as the most valuable prizes, as they could be sold to the highest advantage in the bazars of Khiva or Bokhara; it was also considered a lucky stroke when any one of wealth or rank was caught, a heavy ransom being expected for his release. We were told of one raid in which one hundred and thirty thousand sheep, goats and other animals had been swept away; this large number has much the appearance of an exaggeration, but supposing we subtract a large discount from the figures—say twenty-five or even fifty per cent.—the sum will yet present a calamitious loss to the people who were despoiled. When the operations on the ground selected were completed, the alaman began its retreat, generally taking another route from that by which it came. If not too much over-burdened with spoil, the plundering would go on during the return march. When a successful expedition had been made, and each returned rich from robbery and crime, there was great rejoicing in the auls, or collections of kibitkas, which form the villages of Turkestan; the Ishans again came forth and uttered prayers of thanks to Allah for all the good things which had come to them.—William Simpson, in Harper's Magazine.

ALASKAN HOUSES.

Mere Circular Mounds, Lighted From the Apex of the Roof.

The houses of the natives are much the same in all divisions of Alaska. The dwellings are thus described: A circular mound of earth, grass growing and littered with all sorts of household utensils, a small spiral coil of smoke rising from the apex, dogs crouching, children climbing up or rolling down, stray morsels of food left from one meal to the other, and a soft mixture of mud and offal surrounding it all. The entrance to this house is a low, irregular square aperture, through which the inmate stoops and passes down a foot or two through a short low passage on to the earthen floor within. The interior generally consists of an irregularly shaped square circle, twelve or fifteen feet in diameter, receiving its only light from without through the small smoke-opening at the apex of the roof, which rises tent-like from the floor. The fireplace is directly under this opening. Rude beds or couches of skin and grass mats are laid, slightly raised above the floor, upon clumsy frames made of sticks and saplings or rough hewn planks, and sometimes on little elevations built up of peat or sod. Sometimes a small hallway with bulging sides is erected over the entrance, where, by this expansion, room is afforded for the keeping of utensils and water vessels and as a shelter for dogs. Immediately adjoining most of these houses will be found a small summer kitchen, a rude wooden frame, walled in and covered over with sods, with an opening at the top to give vent to the smoke. These are entirely above ground, rarely over five or six feet in diameter, and are littered with filth and offal of all kinds; serving also as a refuge for the dogs in inclement weather. In the interior regions, where both fuel and building material are more abundant, the houses change somewhat in appearance and construction; the excavation of the coast houses, made for the purpose of saving both, disappears, and gives way to log-structures above the ground, but still covered with sods. Living within convenient distance of timber, the people (inland) do not depend so much upon the natural warmth of the mother-earth.—Chambers' Journal.

FRIDAY MARCH 14 1890

County Official Paper.

No more important or significant speech on money matters has ever been uttered in the United States Senate than was spoken by Senator Stanford last Monday. The Senator in substance said that coin is but a representative of value. "As an energetic factor in the transactions of men it only amounts to the percentage which it draws, but when the bondholder, by depositing it with the Government, receives back 90 per cent. in Government bills, 90 per cent of its value becomes energized into an active commodity, giving employment to the energies of the country. In like manner, if the farmer were able to borrow from the Government without interest a certain amount of its bills, giving his farm as security therefor, to that extent his land would be an active force, and he would be enabled, while giving employment to the amount loaned him, to improve his farm and increase its value to the full amount of the loan. How far the boundless resources of our country shall be put into activity depends not only upon the active industry of our people, but upon the power necessary to induce that industry, and it should be the fostering care of the Government to see that such industry receives every encouragement.

"If these proposed loans could be made by the Goveanment without risk I do not think there would be any serious obstacle in the way of the accomplishment of the object of this resolution. In my opinion ample protection would be afforded the Government if it limited its loan to one half or one-quarter of the assessed value of the property given as security, and upon the appraisement of Government officers especially apponited for that purpose. It would seem to me that the great thought of humanity should be how to advantage the great multitude of toilers, increase their powar of production and elevate their condition; and to me one of the most effective means of placing at man's disposal the force inherent in the value of property is by thoroughly furnishing a bountiful supply of money based upon unquestioned and secure values."

The statesman who can secure the establishment of a financial policy based upon the plan outlined by Senator Stanford will take rank with Washington and Lincoln. Government loans made upon the plan suggested by Mr. Stanford would start us on a career of such prosperity as would make all our past progress, wonderful as that has been, appear but as the work of children compared to the work of men.

The Old Fugitive Law.

The close of the last session of the Second congress on March 3, 1793, recalls an important act of that body which is little remembered. The Second congress enacted the first fugitive slave law, which originated in the senate and was passed by the house without debate. This statute directed that in case of the escape from any state or territory of any person held to service or labor that the master, agent or attorney of the owner might seize the person held to such service and take him before the United States judge or local magistrate, and on proof, oral or by affidavit, that such person was a fugitive from service the judge or magistrate was directed to grant a certificate to that effect, which certificate should be sufficient for the removal of the fugitive to his former owner. To aid in the escape of a fugitive slave rendered the party liable to a fine of $500. Several northern states soon enacted laws forbidding local magistrates to execute the Federal act, which consequently became a dead letter until its revival in the famous fugitive slave law of 1850.—Philadelphia Times.

Refused Presidents.

In a little village some twelve miles distant from Cleveland, O., there lived, some thirty years ago, two very attractive girls. To one of these President Hayes became a suitor, but the parents of the young lady vigorously opposed the courtship on the ground that young Hayes was poor, and gave evidence of hardly sufficient ability to warrant risking their daughter's future. The match was broken off and the lady is today married and well known in Cleveland society. The other young lady had received many attentions from young Garfield, and was disposed to reciprocate them. Her parents, however, objected to their intimacy, giving as a reason for their opposition the poverty of Garfield and the anything but bright prospects of his future. The chief coincidence of these courtships consists in the fact that Bedford, where both these young ladies lived, contained at the time less than 500 inhabitants, and both refused two future presidents of the United States because of their poverty.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A HAPPY TRYST.

With Madge the miller's daughter,
While song birds were a-wing,
I wandered 'mid the waving corn,
With its golden tasseling;
And down the crested hillside swept
The yellow sunlight's tide,
And O! the gray old world looked bright
As we walked side by side.

With arm around her lissome waist,
I whisper'd words endearing;
And sweet and low her answer came—
Almost too low for hearing;
And hide and seek the frolic winds
Play'd 'mid the rustling corn;
And O! our hearts with love were full
On that fair summer morn.

But ah, love's wings are very fleet,
And sweetest hours have ending;
Too soon we heard the old mill's sails
Beneath their labor bending;
But long before we left the corn
My gentle Madge I kist,
And O! me thought its tasseled sheaves
Had ne'er hid happier tryst.

THE ROTHSCHILDS.

Characteristics of the Parent Heads of the Financial Family.

Some ten years ago old Baron Rothschild passed away full of years, leaving behind him a gigantic fortune. His three nephews, Nathaniel, Leopold and Alfred, sons of Baron Lionel Rothschild, inherited the city business, while his vast riches in cash, lands, house property and securities were for the most part bequeathed to his daughter, the Countess of Rosebery. The three London Rothschilds of today bear little resemblance, either in face, form or business habits, to either their late father or uncle. The elder, Nathaniel, lately created Lord Rothschild, is a far seeing man of great business capacity, and under his guidance the great house still maintains its supremacy in the world of London finance. He is, however, a man who devotes his attention only to great enterprises, and consequently a vast amount of minor business of a very profitable nature that used to be executed by the Rothschilds has of late flowed into other channels.

His lordship excels as a diplomat, and his relations with Gladstone's government during the Egyptian affair were close and invaluable to his house. Simple British tax payers who paid any attention to the part England was playing in the khedive's affairs for a year or two previous to the slaughtering of the heroic Gordon at Khartoum, roundly asserted that her expensive interference in Egypt would never have been pushed so far but for the vast interests of the Rothschilds and their clients there at stake." The head of the firm does not inherit his uncle's love of sport; he neither breeds nor runs thoroughbred race horses, and is rarely seen in the hunting field, though in a perfunctory manner he still keeps up the famed pack of staghounds. His counsel in financial matters is highly esteemed by her majesty's government, and his life, like that of his predecessor, is devoted to money getting. More Jewish in appearance than either of his brothers, his character and habits also more clearly indicate his Hebraic origin.

Alfred de Rothschild is also very regular in his attention to business in "the lane." He is not generally credited with any particular aptitude for playing the great game of finance, but has charge of the routine business of the firm. Almost any morning on the stroke of 11 his neat brougham may be seen pulling up at the corner of Cannon street and St. Swithin's lane, whence its elegantly attired owner proceeds on foot to his office. He is a handsome man, of medium stature and dark complexion, and his features are only slightly indicative of his Semitic origin. In private life he is something of a sybarite; his taste in works of art is highly cultivated; he is a liberal patron of some of the first painters of the day, and an ardent and discriminative collector of old china and bric-a-brac.

Leopold de Rothschild does not resemble his brothers either in his features or mode of life. The younger brother takes but little part in the business of the great house, and rarely puts in an appearance in St. Swithin's lane. He is a somewhat delicate looking man, of fair complexion, with a mild, kindly face.

A liberal patron of the drama, he is rarely absent from his box at the opera or his stall at the theatre on "first nights," and he numbers among his friends many of the leading members of the profession. He is in the Prince of Wales' set and is on terms of intimacy with the heir apparent. But it is as an owner of race horses that Leopold de Rothschild is, perhaps, best known to the English people. While lacking his late uncle's enthusiasm in his pursuit of the national sport of Britons, he maintains a large stable of thoroughbreds at Newmarket, where he also has a residence, and it may fairly be said that there are no colors more popular on the turf than the Rothschild blue and yellow.

One estimable characteristic of the English Rothschilds may be noted as the common possession of each of the three brothers. Their charity knows no limit, their sympathy once enlisted on behalf of a worthy object. Their names are never missing from any public subscription list, while their private benevolences are ever dispensed with open hand and presumably cheerful heart.—Philadelphia Times.

Compressed Sawdust for Fire Wood.

"I'm thinking of making a dryer for drying sawdust," said a well known Lewiston man, Tuesday. "It will be a big business some day. A firm down in Bangor is taking the lead. Their purpose is, you know, to press it by hydraulic power into about one-tenth its bulk, and sell it for fuel after all the moisture has been excluded. You see the effect of moisture. The intense strain created by burning would burst the adhering structure and make it inefficient as fuel. When you come to think of the enormous waste of sawdust it is apparent that modern economics has hold of the right end of a long clew."—Lewiston Journal.

An Arizona Indian Shampoo.

The hair of both sexes is worn long, reaching nearly to the waist, and is cut squarely across. Do the dusky children of the desert profane their ebon locks with brush or comb? Not to any great extent. They follow a device at once economical, unique and effective. They make a thick paste of the adobe soil and water, and, having wound the hair closely around their heads, they smear it from brow to occiput with sticky gray mud and let it dry. When thoroughly dry it is cracked off and the hair emerges therefrom clean, smooth and glossy as the proverbial raven's wing. Compared to this the shampoo of civilization is foolishness.—Chicago Tribune.

Their Deaths Foretold by a Ghost.

Robert Withers, M. A. Vicar of Gately, England, in 1706, relates, in a publication of that time, the following singular story of the supernatural:

"Mr. Grose went to see Mr. Shaw on the 2nd of August last. As they were talking in the evening Mr. Shaw says: 'On the 21st of last month, as I was smoking a pipe and reading in my study, between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, in comes Mr. Naylor (formerly fellow of St. John's College, but who had been dead for four years). When I saw him I was not much affrighted, and I asked him to sit down, which, accordingly, he did for about two hours, and we talked together. I asked him how it fared with him. He said: 'Very well.' Were any of our old acquaintances with him? 'No' (at which I was very much alarmed), 'but Mr. Orchard will be with me very soon, and you not long after.' As he was going away I asked him if he would not stay a little longer, but he refused. 'No, he had but three days' leave of absence, and he had other business.'

"Mr Orchard died soon after. Mr. Shaw is now dead. He was formerly fellow of St. John's College—an ingenuous, good man. I knew him there; but at his death he had a college living at Oxfordshire, and here he saw the apparition"—Cincinnati Enquirer.

MONDAY, March 10th.

The People vs. Frank Greer—Defendant plead guilty to grand larceny and was sentenced to three years at San Quentin.

THURSDAY, March 13th.

The People vs. W. T. C. Elliott—On motion of attorneys for defendant, ordered that papers and record in the case be transferred to the Clerk of the Superior Court of Kern county. Also transcript of all evidence taken at the trial in shorthand and transcribed by the reporter, W. A. Harris.

BORN.

SPEAR—At Lone Pine, March 9, 1890, to Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Spear, a son.

DIED.

SNOW—At Keeler, March 9, 1890, Charles B. Snow, aged 57 years.

Sunday school at the regular hour.

O. I. Mairs has gone to Los Angeles.

The 17th of Ireland at Keeler on Monday.

Hon. A. J. Gould has so far recovered from his recent illness that he is able to be about again.

A good many people from Independence will attend the party at Keeler on Monday evening.

Messrs. Cofer and Swan expect to have the bridge across Owens river ready for travel by the end of next week.

S. A. Densmore keeps adding to his orchard every year. He is setting out eight acres more of young fruit trees.

Horace Bellows is reported to have bonded his Haiwai ranch to parties in San Francisco. The option of purchasing to continue for six months.

Through the influence of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles a tannery is to established in that city. It will be backed by plenty of capital.

It is said that Jack Wilson imported seed from the "ould sod" and has raised a large crop of shamrocks for use at the Keeler party on Monday next.

Mr. N. E. Conklin, Deputy Postmaster, is in charge of the office at Independence during the absence of Postmaster Moore, who has gone to Sacramento.

Potter & Mathews, Civil Engineers, are making surveys about the lower end of Owens Lake. They are said to be working for parties in San Francisco.

A citrus fair has been in progress at Los Angeles during the week. It is safe to say that this will be the finest display of citrus fruits ever seen in the United States.

A trotting horse association at Paterson, New Jersey, offer a purse of $10,000 for a race between Sunol and Axtel. The famous mare is yet under control of Senator Stanford.

Charles B. Snow died at Keeler last Saturday. He had long been afflicted with asthma and found more relief at Keeler, where he has been for a month past, than at his home at Hawthorne.

Mrs. W. L. Hunter is reported to be again suffering from a disease of the eyes that makes her almost blind. She has been sorely afflicted in this way for several years but recently had been much better.

Mr. J. H. Roberts was in town last Tuesday. He says there has been some claim jumping among locators of borax ground in Saline Valley but no serious trouble. Conn & Trudo are taking out borax right along.

The cold nights have kept the fruit trees from budding out, and so much the better. The past few days peach, apricot and almond trees are blooming rapidly. So far there is an excellent prospect for a good fruit crop.

At the beginning of the present week several hundred head of stock cattle were sold by parties at or near Independence. The prices paid ranged from $8.00 to $9 50 per head. The cattle will be kept in Owens Valley so long as they can be as cheaply provided for here as elsewhere.

A citizen of Elko, Nevada, informs the Reno Gazette that he will vouch for the truth of the statement that his spirit thermometer registered 64 degrees below zero. He says that at Hallock, in the same county, it was reported at the same time that the temperature was 72 degress below zero.

Mr. Thomas Hamilton got severely hurt on Wednesday afternoon by being thrown from a wagon near his home at Georges Creek. Dr. Woodin was sent for, who went and stayed with Mr. Hamilton until after midnight. No bones were broken, but he is an old man and the heavy fall stunned him badly. The doctor says he will be all right again soon.

The trotting horses taken by L. J. Rose from Los Angeles to New York were sold at auction. One two-year-old filly sold for $10,000; another sold for $5,250 and a third for $8,100. Forty-three head realized $138,880. Alcazar alone brought $25,800. The demand for trotting stock is increasing and there is no trouble getting big prices for well bred animals.

Rev. E. Van Deventer, Superintendent of the Nevada Mission, held Quarterly Meeting at Lone Pine last Sunday. He preached at Independence the same evening and also Monday evening. On Tuesday evening he lectured on "The Mistakes of Ingersoll." A good audience attended and listened with close attention. Mr. Van Deventer was attended on the trip by Mrs. Van Deventer. Both went to Keeler on Wednesday and north to Reno next day.

Interest ng to Farmers.

Virginia City merchants advertise the following prices: Fresh eggs, 20c a dozen; fresh butter, 50c a roll; dressed turkeys, 18c a pounds; dressed chickens, 16c a pound; best Eeastern hams, 14c a pound; best bacon, 12½c a pound. Plumas, Lassen and Sierra counties supply much of these products and the goods must be hauled long distances by teams. No one of the counties named can compare with Owens Valley in natural advantages for the production of the articles named; and yet farmers here are paid much higher prices than are asked by the retail dealers in Virginia, with cost of transportation and profit included. And at the hihger prices paid here not enough of those articles are produced to supply the demand. Either the people who produce the goods sold in Virginia are working for less than nothing, or they have some method that enables them to produce the articles cheaper than can be done by our own farmers, even with much greater advantages of soil and climate in their favor. It might be worth while for farmers here to give study to this subject.

A Long Trip.

Under-Sheriff Yaney got back last Monday from a long trip to the south end of the county and over into San Bernardino. He was gone twelve days, John Alexander accompanying him as guide. Mr. Alexander knows all of that vast desert region well. On the trip the travelrs passed over about seventy-five miles of the surveyed route of the Salt Lake and Los Angeles railroad. Like all others who have been over that region Mr. Yaney says there are abundant evidences of vast mineral deposits. At present there is very little prospecting being done. He thinks there are not more than fifteen or twenty men prospecting in a region containing several hundred square miles. The travelers had to camp out after they left Darwin until they returned there, but the weather was not cold and they suffered no hardship.

Cattle Interests.

Late reports by men well informed on the subject say that the losses of cattle in Nevada are far from being so great as at first reported. It is said that the heaviest losses are among the small herds belonging to men who have not been long in the business. That all of the large owners, who have fine ranges and years of experience, make it a rule to be prepared for hard winters, and therefore the percentage of loss in the large herds will be comparatively light. It is argued, and with apparently good reason, that the losses during the past winter will not be felt in the market either for beef or stock cattle inside of a year, or perhaps longer. It is further said that if the cattle business in the southern ranges continues as flourishing the next two or three years as it has been for some years past those ranges will supply beef cattle in such numbers that prices will not increase at all. Only a succession of dry seasons on the southern ranges could make any material change in this result.

Immense Salt Deposit.

During his recent trip to the Ibex mines Sheriff Eldred saw an immense deposit of salt. On the west side of the Amargosa Valley, about twenty-five miles south from the sink in Death Valley, is a range of round topped hills extending about six miles. This appears to be an entire mass of salt. Thin veins of gypsum are interspersed through the mass and where the salt has been dissolved and carried away by the rains the gypsum sticks up all over the hills like fins on a fish. The salt is solid as rock; a good deal has been quarried out and used in working ores; the small amount of gspsum appears to make it especially valuable for this purpose. The survey for the Salt Lake and Los Angeles railroad runs along close to the base of the hills.

Chance for a Flood.

Mr. J. Willett says the highest flood he ever saw in Owens river was in July 1864. At that time the water was several feet higher than the recent flood. In the year named there was a heavy fall of snow in the mountains and near the headwaters of the river, in Long Valley. Mr. Willett says he is confident there is more snow in the mountains now than there was then. In 1864 cold weather continued in the mountains till the season was far advanced. Then hot weather set in suddenly, the vast bodies of snow melted very rapidly and a great flood was the result. The river continued very high for several weeks. Mr. Willett says that up till now there is a close similarity between this season and that of 1864 and he thinks there is a probability of another big flood.

Another Change.

The Elliott case has again been changed, the date fixed being May 6th. This change is worse for witnesses, most of whom are farmers. If the time was fixed for not earlier than May 20th it would be much better. After that date there is a lull in farm work between seeding and haying time when it would not be such a hardship upon Owens Valley farmers to attend the trial. It is hard enough upon our farmers to make a journey of four hundred miles in wagons or on horseback to serve as witnesses and certainly the time should be so fixed as to cause them the least possible loss by being away from their homes at a busy season. Attorney Conklin has applied for a change of time as suggested.

Bitten.

An Eastern sharp who thought a sure road to fortune was to be found over a mail route contract in California put in a bid for a certain route in Inyo county. He got the contract and then, when it was too late, set to work to find out what was necessary to carry out the contract. The result is that the contractor pays another party two hundred dollars more than the contract price to take the white elephant off his hands. In bidding for mail routes through sparsely settled and desert regions it is well to have a thorough knowledge of the country and all its conditions before bids are entered, otherwise the mail contract may be a very dear bargain to the contractor.

New Postal Route

A mail route has been ordered between Keeler and Mojave. In the list of routes advertised by the Postmaster General for bids is the following:

From Keeler, by Olancha and Freeman, to Mojave, 115 miles, and back, twice a week. Leave Keeler Monday and Thursday at 6 a. m. Arrive at Mojave Tuesday and Friday by 6 p. m. Bond required with bid, $5,800; check, $290. Proposals received until 4 p. m., April 10, 1890. Decisions announced on or before April 28, 1890.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutritious juice of California figs, combined with the medicinal virtues of plants known to be most beneficial to the human system, acts gently on the kidneys, liver and bowels, effectually cleansing the sytem, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Fish Springs Mines.

Very favorable mining reports come from Fish Spring. According to said reports a great mass of quartz that crops out about a quarter of a mile west from the county road, near the top of Fish Spring hill has been prospected and is found to contain gold enough to give a good profit for working. Robert Irvine, Henry Melone, C. L. Fuller and James McCarty have located claims on the ledge. In a very few days these men have taken out 150 tons of ore. The rock so far is all on the surface and is quarried out easily without blasting. There is plenty of water near by and all the other requirements for the easy working of the ore. James Rose has collected about two hundred tons of tailings on the creek and will work the lot as soon as warm weather sets in. The tailings worked so far have paid well enough.

County Bonds.

Last Tuesday morning County Clerk P. H. Mack and Treasurer J. J. Moore left Independence for Sacramento. These officers have gone to complete the refunding of the county bonds at a lower rate of interest and to transfer the new bonds, most of which are taken by the State. Mr. Frank Andrews of Laws was also of the party. Sheriff Eldred went along with Frank Greer in charge for San Quentin. Greer came into Court last Monday and plead guilty to the charge of stealing money from James Jenkins. He was sent up for three years. The whole party went out by Mojave, O. I. Mairs conveying them with a four-horse coach.

A New Marble Mill.

The Inyo Marble Company have secured a millsite at Verdi, on the C. P. railroad west from Reno. Some misunderstanding about building a dam has caused delay in erecting the mill. This difficulty is now settled and work on the mill is expected to be pushed ahead at once. Mr. M. V. Bronson is expected to go from the quarry to Verdi to superintend the building of the mill. The Company knows its own business best, but to an outsider it would appear as if the mill should be located near the quarry, where plenty of water power can be had.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

Edward burst out laughing; and the squire looked after his retainer with a comical air.

"No wonder that the place has got in such a mess with such a fellow as that to manage it," he said aloud. "The idea of hunting a man round the Poplars Farm like—like an Indian squaw. He's a regular cadger, that's what he is, and that's all he's fit for. However, it's his way of doing business, and I sha'n't alter him. Well, Mr. Cossey," he went on, "this is a very sad state of affairs, at any rate so far as I am concerned. I presume, of course, that you know of the steps which have been taken by Cossey & Son to force a foreclosure, for that is what it amounts to, though I have not as yet received the formal notice; indeed I presume that those steps have been taken under your advice."

"Yes, Mr. de la Molle, I know all about it, and here is the notice calling in the loans," and he placed a folded paper on the table.

"Ah," said the squire, "I see. As I remarked to your manager, Mr. Quest, yesterday, I think that, considering the nature of the relationship which has existed for so many generations between our family and the business firm of which you are the member; considering, too, the peculiar circumstances in which the owners of land find themselves at this moment, and the ruinous loss—to put questions of sentiment aside—that must be inflicted by such sale upon the owner of property, that more consideration might have been shown. However, it is use less to try to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear or to get blood from a stone, so I suppose that I must make the best of a bad job, and,' with a most polite bow, "I really do not know that I have anything more to say to you, Mr Cossey. I will forward the notice to my lawyers; indeed, I think that it might have been sent to them in the first instance."

Edward Cossey had all this while been sitting on an old oak chair, his eyes fixed upon the ground, and slowly swinging his hat between his legs. Suddenly he looked up, and, to the squire's surprise, said quietly:

"I quite agree with you. I don't think that you can say anything too bad about the behavior of my people. A Shoreditch Jew could not have done worse. And look here, Mr. de la Molle, to come to the point and prevent misunderstanding, I may as well say at once that, with your permission, I am anxious to take up these mortgages myself for two reasons: I regard them as a desirable investment even in the present condition of land, and also I wish to save Cossey & Son from the discredit of the step which they meditate."

For the second time that morning the squire looked up with the sharp and searching gaze he usually assumed, and for the second time his instinct—for he was too heady a man to reason overmuch—came into play and warned him that in making this offer Edward Cossey had other motives than those which he had brought forward. He paused to consider what they might be. Was he anxious to get the estate for himself? Was he put forward by somebody else? Quest, perhaps; or was it something to do with Ida? The first alternative seemed the most probable to him. But whatever was the lender's object, the result to him was the same—it gave him a respite. For Mr. de la Molle knew well enough that he had no more chance of raising the money from any ordinary source of investment that he had of altering the condition of agriculture.

"Hum," he said, "this is an important matter, a most important matter. I presume, Mr. Cossey, that before making this definite offer you have consulted a legal adviser?"

"Oh, yes, I have done all that, and am quite satisfied with the security—an advance of thirty thousand charged on all the Honham castle estates at 4 per cent. The question now is if you are prepared to consent to the transfer. In that case all the old charges on the property will be paid off; and Mr. Quest, who will act for me in the matter, will prepare a simple deed charging the property for the round total."

"Ah, yes, the plan seems a satisfactory one; but, of course, in so important a matter I should prefer to consult my legal adviser before giving a final answer; indeed, I think that it would be better if the whole affair were carried out in a proper and formal way."

"Surely, surely, Mr. de la Molle," said the younger man with some irritation, for the old gentleman's somewhat magnificent manner rather annoyed him, which, under the circumstances, was not unnatural. "Surely you do not want to consult a legal adviser to make up your mind as to whether or not you will allow a foreclosure. I offer you the money at 4 per cent. Cannot you let me have an answer now—yes or no?"

"I don't like being hurried. I can't bear to be hurried," said the squire, pettishly. "These important matters require consideration, a great deal of consideration. Still," he added, observing signs of increased irritation upon Edward Cossey's face, and not having the slightest intention of throwing away the opportunity, though he would dearly have liked to prolong the negotiations for a week or two, if it was only to enjoy the illusory satisfaction of dabbling with such a large sum of money—"still, as you are so pressing about it, I really, speaking offhand, can see no objection to your taking up the mortgages on the terms you mention."

"Very well, Mr. de la Molle. Now I have, on my part, one condition, and one only, to attach to this offer of mine, that is, that my name is not mentioned in connection with it. I do not wish Cossey & Son to know that I have taken up this investment on my own account. In fact, so necessary to me is it that it should not be mentioned, that if it does transpire before the affair is completed, I shall withdraw my offer, and if it transpires afterward I shall call the money in. The loan will be advanced by a client of Mr. Quest's. Is that understood between us?"

"Hum," said the squire. "I don't quite like this secrecy about these important matters of business, but still if you make a point of it, why, of course, I cannot object."

"Very good. Then I presume that you will write officially to Cossey & Son stating that the money will be forthcoming to meet their various charges and the overdue interest. And now I think that we have had about enough of this business for once; so with your permission I will pay my respects to Miss de la Molle before I go."

"Dear me," said the squire, pressing his hand to his head, "you do hurry me so dreadfully—I really don't know where I am. Miss de la Molle is out; I saw her go out sketching myself. Sit down and we will talk this business over a little more."

"No, thank you, Mr. de la Molle; I have to talk about money every day of my life, and I soon have enough of the subject. Quest will arrange all the details. Good-by. Don't bother to ring, I will find my horse." And with a shake of the hand he was gone.

CHAPTER XIII.

ABOUT ART.

Edward Cossey drove from the castle in a far from happy frame of mind. To begin with, the squire and his condescending way of doing business irritated him very much, so much that once or twice in the course of the conversation he was within an ace of breaking the whole thing off, and only restrained himself with difficulty from so doing. As it was, notwithstanding all the sacrifices and money risks which he was undergoing to take up these mortgages—and they were very considerable even to a man of his great prospects—he felt that he had been placed in the position of a person who receives a favor rather than of a person who grants one. Moreover, there was an assumption of superiority about the old man, a visible recognition of the gulf which used to be fixed between the gentleman of family and the man of business who had grown rich by trading in money and money's worth, which was the more galling because it was founded on actual fact, and Edward Cossey knew it. All his foibles and oddities notwithstanding, it would have been impossible for any man of discernment to entertain a comparison between the half bankrupt squire and the young banker, who would shortly be worth between half a million and a million sterling. The former was a representative, though a somewhat erratic one, of all that is best in the old type of Englishmen of gentle blood, which is now so rapidly vanishing, and, indeed, of the class to which, to a very large extent, this country owes her greatness.

No wonder that Edward Cossey felt his inferiority to this symbol and type of the things that no more are—yes, even in the shadow of his thirty thousand pounds. For here we have a different breed. Goldsmiths two centuries ago, then bankers from generation to generation, money bees seeking for wealth and counting it and hiving it from decade to decade, till at last money became to them what honor is to the nobler stock—the pervading principle—and the clink of the guinea and the rustling of the bank note stirred their blood as the clang of armed men and the sound of the flapping banner, with its three golden hawks flaming in the sun, was wont to set the hearts of the race of Boissey, of Dofferleigh, and of De la Molle, beating to that tune to which England marched on to win the world.

And the upshot of all this is that the squire was not altogether wrong when he declared in the silence of his chamber that Edward Cossey was not quite a gentleman. He showed it when he allowed himself to be guided by the arts of Mr. Quest into the adoption of the idea of obtaining a lien upon Ida, to be enforced if convenient. He showed it again, and what is more he committed a huge mistake, when, tempted thereto by the opportunity of the moment, he made a conditional bargain with the said Ida, whereby she was placed in pledge for the sum of thirty thousand pounds, well knowing that her honor would be equal to the test, and that if convenient to him she would be ready to pay the debt. I say he made a huge mistake, for had he been quite a gentleman he would have known that he could not have adopted a worse road to the affections of a lady. Had he been content to advance the money, and then by and by—though even that would not have been gentleman like—have gently let it transpire what he had done at great personal expense and inconvenience, her imagination might have been touched, and her gratitude would certainly have been excited. But the idea of bargaining, the idea of purchase, which, after what had passed, could never be put aside, would of necessity be fatal to any hope of tender feeling. Shylock might get his bond, but of his own act he had debarred himself from the possibility of ever getting more.

Now Edward Cossey was not lacking in that after glow of refinement which is left behind by a course of public school and university education. No education can make a gentleman of a man who is not a gentleman at heart; for whether his station in life be that of a plowboy or an earl, the gentleman, like the poet, is born and not made. But it can and does, if he be of an observant nature, give him a certain insight into the habits of thought and probable course of action of the members of that class to which he outwardly, and by repute, belongs. Such an insight Edward Cossey possessed, and at the present moment its possession was troubling him very much. His trading instincts, the desire bred in him to get something for his money, had led him to make the bargain; but now that it was done his better judgment rose up against it. For the truth may as well be told at once, although he would as yet scarcely acknowledge it to himself, Edward Cossey was already violently enamored of Ida. He was by nature a passionate man, and as it chanced, she had proved the magnet with power to draw his passion. But as the reader is aware, there existed another complication in his life for which he was not perhaps entirely responsible. When still quite a youth in mind he had suddenly found himself the object of the love of a beautiful and inthralling woman, and he had, after a more or less severe struggle, yielded to the temptation, as, out of a book, many young men would have done. Now to be the object of the violent affection of such a woman as Belle Quest is no doubt very flattering and even charming for awhile. But if that affection is not returned in kind—if, in short, the gentleman does not love the lady quite so warmly as she loves him—then in course of time the charm is apt to vanish, and even the flattery to cease to please. Also, when, as in the present case, the connection is wrong in itself and universally condemned by society, the affection which can still triumph and endure on both sides must be of a very strong and lasting order. Even an unprincipled man dislikes the acting of one long lie such as an intimacy of the sort necessarily involves, and if the man happens to be rather weak than unprincipled the dislike is apt to turn to loathing, some portion of which will certainly in time be reflected on to the partner of his ill doing.

This was the state of affairs before he became attached to Ida de la Molle, after which the horizon grew blacker than ever. At first he tried to get out of the difficulty by avoiding Ida, but it did not answer. She exercised an irresistible attraction over him. Her calm and stately presence was to him what the sight of the mountain snows are to one scorched by continual heat. He was weary of passionate outbursts, tears, agonies, alarms, presentiments and all the paraphernalia of secret love. It appeared to him, looking up at the beautiful snow, that if once he could reach it, life would all be sweetness and light, that there would be no more thirst, no more fear, and no more forced marches through those ill odored quagmires of deceit. The more he allowed his imagination to dwell upon the picture the fiercer grew his longing to possess it. Also he knew well enough that to marry a woman like Ida de la Molle would be the greatest blessing that could happen to him, for she would of necessity lift him up above himself. She had no money, it is true, but that was a very minor matter to him, and she had birth and breeding and beauty and that presence which commands homage. And so it came to pass that he fell deeply and yet more deeply in love with Ida, and that as he did so his connection with Mrs. Quest (although we have seen him but yesterday offering in a passing fit of tenderness and remorse to run away with her) became more and more irksome to him. And now as he drove leisurely back to Boisingham, he felt that he had imperiled all his hopes by a rash indulgence in his trading instincts.

Presently the road he was following took a turn and revealed a sight that did not tend to improve his already irritable mood. Just here the roadway was bordered by a deep bank covered with trees which sloped down to the valley of the Ell, at this time of the year looking its loveliest in the soft autumn lights. And here, seated on a slope of turf beneath the shadow of a yellowing chestnut tree, in such a position as to get a view of the green valley and flashing river, where cattle red and white stood chewing the still luxuriant aftermath, was none other than Ida herself, and, what was more, Ida accompanied by Col. Quaritch. They were seated on camp stools, and in front of each of them was an easel. Clearly they were painting together, for even as Edward gazed the colonel rose, came up close behind his companion's stool, made a ring of his thumb and first finger, gazed critically through it at the lady's performance, and then sadly shook his head and made some remark, whereupon Ida turned round and commenced an animated discussion.

"Hang me," said Edward to himself, "if she has not taken up with that confounded old military frump. Painting together! Ah, I know what that means. Well, I should have thought that if there was one man more than another whom she would have disliked, it would have been that battered looking colonel." He pulled up his horse and reflected for a moment, then handed the reins to his servant, jumped out, and climbing through a gap in the fence walked up to the tree where the pair were sitting. So engrossed were they in their argument that they neither saw nor heard him.

"It's nonsense, Col. Quaritch, perfect nonsense, if you will forgive me for saying so," Ida was saying, with warmth. "It is all very well for you to complain that my trees are a blur and the castle nothing but a splotch, but I am looking at the water, and if I am looking at the water, it is quite impossible that I should see the trees and the cows otherwise than I have rendered them on the canvas. True art is to paint what the painter sees and as he sees it."

Col. Quaritch shook his head and sighed.

"The cant of the impressionist school," he said, sadly; "on the contrary, the business of the artist is to paint what he knows to be there," and he gazed complacently at his own canvas, which had the appearance of a spirit drawing of a fortified place, or of the contents of a child's Noah's ark, so stiff, so solid, so formidable were its outlines, trees and animals.

Ida shrugged her shoulders, laughed merrily, and turned round to find herself face to face with Edward Cossey. She started back and her face hardened—then she stretched out her hand and said: "How do you do?" in her very coldest tones.

"How do you do, Miss de la Molle?" he said, assuming as unconcerned an air as he could, and bowing stiffly to Harold Quaritch, who returned the bow and went back to his canvas, which was placed a few paces off.

"I saw you painting," went on Edward Cossey, in a low tone, "so I thought I would come and tell you that I have settled that matter with Mr. de la Molle."

"Oh, indeed," answered Ida, hitting viciously at a wasp with her paint brush. "Well, I hope that you will find the investment a satisfactory one. And now, if you please, do not let us talk any more about money, because I am quite tired of the subject." Then raising her voice, she went on: "Come here, Col. Quaritch, and Mr. Cossey shall judge between us," and she pointed to her picture.

Edward glanced at the colonel with no amiable air. "I know nothing about art," he said, "and I am afraid I must be getting on. Good morning." And taking off his hat to Ida he turned and went.

"Umph," said the colonel, looking after him with a quizzical expression, "that gentleman seems rather short in his temper. Wants knocking about the world a bit, I should say. But I beg your pardon, I suppose that he is a friend of yours, Miss de la Molle?"

"He is an acquaintance of mine," answered Ida, with emphasis.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE TIGER SHOWS HER CLAWS.

After this very chilling reception at the hands of the object of his affection, Edward Cossey, as may be imagined, continued his drive in an even worse temper than before. He reached his rooms, had some luncheon, and then in pursuance of a previous engagement went over to The Oaks to see Mrs. Quest.

He found her waiting for him in the drawing room. She was standing at the window with her hands behind her, a favorite attitude of hers. As soon as the door was shut she turned, came up to him, and grasped his hand affectionately between her own.

"It is an age since I have seen you, Edward," she said, "one whole day. Really, when I do not see you, I do not live—I only exist."

He freed himself from her clasp with a quick movement.

"Really, Belle," he said, impatiently, "you might be a little more careful than to go through that sort of performance in front of an open window—especially as the gardener must have seen the whole thing."

"I don't much care if he did," she said defiantly. "What does it matter? My husband is certainly not in a position to make a fuss about other people."

"What does it matter?" he said, stamping his foot. "What does it not matter? If you have no care for your good name, do you suppose that I am indifferent to mine?"

Mrs. Quest opened her large violet eyes to the fullest extent, and a curious light reflected from them.

"You have grown wonderfully careful all of a sudden, Edward," she said meaningly.

"What is the use of my being careful when you are so reckless? I tell you what it is, Belle. We are talked of all over this gossiping town, and I don't like it; and, what is more, once and for all, I won't have it. If you will not be more careful I will break with you altogether, and that is the long and short of it."

"Where have you been this morning?" she asked, in the same ominously calm voice.

"I have been to Honham castle on a matter of business."

"Oh, and yesterday you were there on a matter of pleasure. Now, did you happen to see Ida in the course of your business?"

"Yes," he answered, looking her full in the face. "I did see her. What about it?"

"By appointment, I suppose?"

"No, not by appointment. Have you done your catechism?"

"Yes—and now I am going to preach a homily on it. I see through you perfectly, Edward. You are getting tired of me and you want to be rid of me. I tell you plainly that you are not going the right way to work about it. No woman, especially if she be in my unfortunate position, can tamely bear to see herself discarded for another. Certainly I cannot—and I caution you—caution you to be careful, because when I think of such a thing I am not quite myself," and suddenly, and without the slightest warning (for her face had been hard and cold as a stone), she burst into a flood of tears.

Now Edward Cossey, being but a man, was somewhat broken down at this sight. Of course he did his best to console her, though with no great results, for she was still sobbing bitterly when suddenly there came a knock at the door. Mrs. Quest turned her face toward the wall and pretended to be reading a letter, and tried to look as unconcerned as possible.

"A telegram for you, sir," said the girl, with a sharp glance at her mistress. "The telegraph boy brought it on here when he found that you were not at home, because he said he would be sure to find you here—and please, sir, he hopes that you will give him sixpence for bringing it round, as he thought it might be important."

Edward felt in his pocket and gave the girl a shilling, telling her to say that there was no answer. As soon as she was gone he opened the telegram and started. It was from his sister in London, and ran as follows:

"Come up to town at once. Father has had a stroke of paralysis. Shall expect you by the 7 o'clock train."

"What is it?" said Mrs. Quest, noting the alarm on his face.

"Why, my father is very ill. He has had a stroke of paralysis, and I must go to town by the next train."

"Shall you be long away?"

"I do not know. How can I tell? Good-by, Belle. I am sorry that we should have had this scene just as I am going, but I can't help it."

"Oh, Edward," she said, catching him by the arm and turning her tear stained face up toward his own, "you are not angry with me, are you? Do not let us part in anger. How can I help being jealous when I love you so? Tell me that you do not hate me—or I shall be wretched all the time that you are away."

"No, no, of course not—but I must say that I wish that you would not make such shocking scenes. Good-by."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

It is not often that a reigning Queen finds herself without a single change of dress. This was, however, the fate of her Majesty of Belgium, on the 1st inst. Her entire wardrobe had been destroyed in the conflagration of the Royal Palace at Laeken, and owing to the fact of the day being a public holiday, every store in Brussels was closed.

A TRUE REASON.

We ask as a special favor to yourselves for all who happen to glance at the above heading, not to fail reading this notice and the testamonial below from one of the best known business women in this country.

DEC. 10, 1889.

SIERRA CHEM. CO.,

GENTLEMEN:—Nothing but a desire to benefit the afflicted induces me to give you the following statements of facts. I have been a sufferer with dizziness in my head, and my constitution was generally broken down. At times my back would ache so that I thought I would have to give up, and my symptoms were such that I became sure that my kidneys were diseased. Your GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE was recommended to me, and I have given it a square trial, and can now say that it is all, and even more than is claimed for it, a wonderful remedy. I intend to keep it in my house at all times, and will recommend it to all my friends as I am doing daily. Believe me.

Very Thankfully Yours,
MRS. M. MALLORY,
Sole Agent for McCabe Sanitive Corset, 2212 Mission St., San Francisco, Cal.

Earl Wheeler's Good Luck.

Ticket No. 98,455 drew the capital prize of $600,000 in the December drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery. One-fortieth of this ticket was held by Earl Wheeler, who lives at No. 69 Grove street in this city. Mr. Wheeler therefore was entitled to receive $15,000. A Democrat reporter to-day called at the home of the fortunate man. At first he refused to say anything about the matter. By the use of a little strategy, however, the reporter succeeded in getting from him an admission of the facts, as follows:

"Yes, I held one-fortieth of the winning ticket, and was entitled to $15,000. I was first made aware of it on the receipt of the official notice of the winners sent out by the company. I have had altogether five tickets in the lottery, paying out $5 all told. I will not say anything more on the matter, other than that I held the ticket absolutely and no one was entitled to a division of the prize, as has been reported."

Upon further inquiry the reporter learned that Mr. Wheeler placed the ticket in the hands of Banker J. Vedder Morris for collection, and agent B. F. Oliver of the American Express Company paid Mr. Morris the amount less $101.55 express charges on the 10th instant. Mr. Morris deposited the amount in the Farmer's National Bank in his own name at the request of Mr. Wheeler. The latter dislikes notoriety, hence this roundabout proceeding. That the amount has been received and that The Louisiana State Lottery company fulfilled its obligations Mr. Morris verifies, and his word cannot be questioned.

Mr. Wheeler is 23 years of age and lives with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jerus Wheeler. He is employed in Inman's box shop, but has not been working of late, the shop having shut down. He is a young man of exemplary habits and of a naturally retiring disposition.—Amsterdam (N. Y.) Democrat, January 17.

As a matter of fact—overlooking the encouragement of art—the Jersey cow has been much more useful to this country than the Jersey lily.

BY TOSSING A DOLLAR.

That Is How Ed. Brink Made Fifteen Thousand Dollars.

"Yes, sir, I am $15,000 better off today than I was a few weeks ago, and it cost me but $1 for ticket No. 32,851 in the Mexican Lottery brought me the good fortune."

Thus spake Edward Brink of Spring City, Nev., to an Examiner reporter. Mr. Brink came down from Spring City a few days ago to get his money and perhaps will make his permanent residence in this city. In response to the question as to what use he intended making of his fortune, Mr. Brink said:

"Well, I am going to do several things. I have not made any set plans to speak of, but first I am going to buy a ranch. I have one already picked out in Napa county and it will be mine in a day or two. Then I am going to buy a meat market in this city and place an old friend in charge of it.

"I could hardly realize that I had won so much money and, in fact, I can scarcely realize it yet, and sometimes wonder if I haven't been dreaming. But when I pull out this bankbook and see those figures staring at me, I feel pretty sure that it is no dream, but a reality. I received the money through Wells, Fargo & Co's all O K, and I at once placed it in one of the banks.

"Why did I invest in the Mexican Lottery? Because there were 20 per cent more chances in that one than in any other. They believe in giving the investor a show.

"Have I ever invested in the Mexican Lottery before? Yes, indeed I have, and probably will continue to do so. During the past year I have bought a number of tickets, and generally played lucky. At the present time I am at least $150 ahead on it besides the $15,000 I have just won. I received my money promptly and find the Mexican Lottery people perfectly square.

"How did I happen to buy the winning ticket? Why, just the same way that I bought the others. I have never bought one yet without flipping up a dollar. I am not superstitious, but sometimes when I have had a spare dollar in my pocket, I would take it out and toss it in the air. Heads I won and tails I lost. When it came down heads the dollar went for a Mexican lottery ticket. So by that dollar coming down heads I won fifteen thousand dollars. That is what you might call luck, isn't it? I guess there are lots of fellows who would like to play as lucky."

Mr. Brink is a nice-looking young man of twenty-eight years, and a pleasant gentleman to meet. He has a good education and a shrewd business head, and doubtless his $15,000 will soon increase on his hands. He takes his good luck quietly, and a stranger would not think, from his appearance or action, that he had been fortunate enough to win $15,000 by merely tossing up a silver dollar.

POOR HUMANITY!

The common lot is one of sorrow say—at least—the pessimists, they who look at the worst side. Certainly what would otherwise be a bright existence, is often shadowed by some ailment that overhangs it like a pall, obscuring perpetually the radiance that else would light the path. Such an ailment, and a very common one, is nervousness, or in other words, weakness of the nervous system, a condition only irremediable where inefficient or improper means are taken to relieve it. The concurrent experience of nervous people who have persistently used Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is, that it conquers entirely supersensitiveness of the nerves, as well as diseases—so called—which are invited and sustained by their chronic weakness. As the nerves gain stamina from the great tonic the trouble disappears. Use the Bitters for malaria, rheumatism, billiousness and kidney troubles.

A MOTHER'S LOVE SAVES HER TEN-YEAR OLD CHILD.

My little girl, ten years of age, had Bright's disease. Her ankles, feet and eyes were terribly swollen. Four of our best physicians attended her, but her life was despaired of. A mother's love surmounts all difficulties, and I determined to try Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, made at Rondout, N. Y. Bright's disease! How happy I am that I determined upon this course—for one by one the well-known symptoms of the disease left her. Words fail to express my gratitude, and I cannot too earnestly recommend the Favorite Remedy. Her recovery was entirely due to the Favorite Remedy, which was the only medicine taken after her case was abandoned by the physicians—Mrs. Laura A. Kempton, West Rutland, Vermont

"YES, LITTLE DEAR."

Bess went to church one sultry day,
She kept awake, I'm glad to say,
Till "fourthly" started on its way.

The moments into hours grew;
O dear! O dear! what should she do?
Unseen, she glided from the pew,

And up the aisle demurely went,
On some absorbing mission bent,
Her eyes filled with a look intent.

She stooped and said in plaintive tone,
With hand uplifted toward the dome:
"Please, preacher man, can I go home?"

The treble voice, bell-like in sound,
Disturbed a sermon most profound;
A titter swelled as it went round.

A smile the pastor's face o'erspread—
He paused and bent his stately head:
"Yes, little dear," he gently said.

SPHINXY.

She Looks After the Welfare of the Unfortunate Æronaut.

A balloon descended one day in the cornfield of a farmer on the banks of the Ohio, in that region of Southern Illinois locally known as "Egypt." The æronout, a slight, serious-looking young gentleman with spectacles, extricated himself from the balloon just as the farmer came running from the next field to the scene of the descent.

"Reckon you lit suddin, didn't you?" said the farmer. "Glad to see you, sir, on my property, though folks does gener'ly come in by the front yard when they're comp'ny. Much shook up, do you find?"

"No, I thank you," said the balloonist, "I'm very comfortable. When I saw the 'chute was bound to come down anyway, I steered for a cornfield. It's lucky you didn't have the river run through this field."

"You mought have got some wet, that's a fact," said our farmer with an appreciative grin. "Sphinxy says the Nile don't never drown folks."

"Sphinxy? The Nile? Where am I anyway?"

"In Egypt."

"In Egypt! Impossible. Why, I only left Cincinnati day before yesterday!"

"Yet here you be, said the farmer. "My name's Shelby, and my folks will be tickled to death to have a ballooner to dinner. They's yellow-legged chicken fried, too, to-day. I see Sphinxy and her ma fixing it when I was to the pump, a spell ago."

"But what do you mean about the Nile?" persisted the stranger. "My name is Sewall, and I'll be much obliged for a dinner, but I don't understand. That's the Ohio river, and I must surely have come down in Illinois."

"Shucks, now," laughed the farmer. "Reckon you've lost your bearings, careering and shassaying up 'round in the clouds in that machine o' yourn. In Egypt you be, and I reckon you won't find a pearter section of country nowhur you'll look for it. Come on in, and have some dinner. 'Taint dinner-time for half an hour, but I reckon you'll want to rest up some, before you explain your star-cart to an old fellow like me."

"Oh, no, Mr. Shelby," said Mr. Sewall, "your hospitality shan't run away with your curiosity in that way. Let us spend the half-hour with the balloon. I'll be delighted to tell you any thing I can about it.

They were still looking at the balloon and talking it over when a tall, young girl, wearing a green gingham sunbonnet and a freshly-starched pink calico frock, came out across the corn-field from the farm-house. She walked up to her father and, without looking at the balloon or the balloonist, said: "Paw, come to dinner. Maw says it's spiling powerful fast for lack of eating."

Then she turned and walked away toward the house.

"That's Sphinxy," said her father, in a tone of pride. "Most women folks would have stood around and pestered us to death asking questions: 'What is that?' 'How did it get here?' and all the like of that. But Sphinxy, if you notice, 'tends strictly to her own business. 'Paw,' says she to me, 'come to dinner,' says she. That's enough for Sphinxy, and no questions asked. It's always her way.

"Why, onst they was a cyclone come sudden one night; first one ever heard of in this part of the country. Sphinxy, she was milking the speckled cow when it struck the milking-shed. It took the cow and her both right up, whirled 'em round and whisked 'em off and landed 'em both on that thur island out yander in the river. I had to fetch 'em both off in a flat-boat.

"Sphinxy scared? Not a bit of it!

"'Paw,' said she, 'I'm sorry I spilt all that good fresh milk,' says she, 'but it don't seem to be Speckle's fault no more nor mine,' says she. Never asked once what struck her. No, Sphinxy never asks no questions. Said afterward she knew the Nile wouldn't drownd nobody."

"Do you really call the Ohio the Nile down in this Egypt?" asked Mr. Sewall. "I remember now hearing that Southern Illinois is Egypt."

"Shucks, now, you're getting your wits back, aint you?" laughed Mr. Shelby, as they walked toward the farmhouse. "We call it the Nile here on our farm. Well, 'this is the land o' corn and wine,' and they aint no taller corn than mine."

Mrs. Shelby sat down to the dinner-table with her husband and their guest, whom she welcomed cordially, and concerning whose adventures she asked a hundred questions. She was a small, sallow, vivacous woman, and Mr. Sewell had scarcely a chance to answer half her questions, so rapidly were they showered upon him.

Sphinxy meanwhile, still wearing her green gingham sunbonnet, waited upon the table. She sliced a cucumber fresh from its cooling in a pail of cold well-water, filled Mr. Sewall's glass with milk, and brought him a piece of pie. Still he had not seen the face of the girl with the extraordinary name. She was hidden from observation by her sunbonnet.

Her figure was slender, and not ungraceful in her clean pink frock, her hands were singularly nice hands for a girl who washed dishes three times a day.

After dinner Mr. Sewell sat upon the piazza with his host and hostess for half an hour while the daughter cleared away the dinner things. They could hear the rattle of dishes in the kitchen, but no sound of Sphinxy's voice.

Mr. Sewall asked after awhile how far it was to the railroad station.

"It's a matter of seven miles," said Mrs. Shelby. "Be you going right back to Cincinnati with your balloon?"

"I think I shall. It's badly out of gear," said Mr. Sewell. "I shall know how to arrange it in better shape next time.

"And you think you must be leaving us right off? That's too bad," said Mr. Shelby. "Well, if you must go, I'll drive you over to town in time for you to take the eight o'clock train this evening for Cincinnatah."

"I shall be very much obliged to you," said Mr. Sewall, "and if I could offer you ——"

"Don't mention it. Proud to have sky-scrapers come to visit us. Drop in on us whenever you feel like dropping," returned cordial Mr. Shelby, laughing at his own wit, "and next time you drop, we'll have a feather-bed out in the cornfield all ready for you, eh, mother?"

Sphinxy came out on the piazza.

"Paw," said she, "the cat's fell down the windless into the well, the bucket's off and the cat's squalling."

Mr. Shelby disappeared in great excitement, followed by Mrs. Shelby. Sphinxy turned to Mr. Sewall, looked at him with a frank smile, then ran out to the well to aid in rescuing the cat, whose accident she had announced with much calmness as she had announced dinner, in the usual and unexpected presence of a balloon and a balloonist. Mr. Sewall had smiled in return.

Her look had expressed the most intense admiration. It was evident that the descent of the balloon and the appearance of the young stranger at dinner had touched Sphinxy's imagination. Mr. Shelby was clambering down the stones within the well-shaft when his visitor reached the curb. It was a perilous descent, and a still more slippery ascent after he had sent the drenched cat up in the rescued bucket.

At six o'clock Mr. Shelby brought a rickety old buggy and a lean horse to the front gate, called "Hello the house!" and announced his readiness to take a passenger to town.

Mr. Sewall, who had spent most of the afternoon in a sound sleep on the lounge in Mrs. Shelby's best parlor, making up for sleep lost while in the clouds, came out refreshed and ready to go. They were to drive to the cornfield fence and take up the broken balloon. Mrs. Shelby shook hands heartily, and stood on the piazza smiling and speeding the parting guest.

Sphinxy came around the corner of the house, and walked across the grass to Mr. Sewall. Half-way down the front yard, midway between her father at the gate and her mother on the steps, she stopped beside him.

She had left off her sunbonnet, and he saw a bright, girlish face. She held out a small parcel.

"You might need it. Don't open it till you get to town," said she, blushing with timidity. Then before he could thank her or say good-bye she had put the parcel into his hands and had run away. Her pink frock whisked out of sight around the corner of the house directly.

"What did Sphinxy present you with?" asked Mr. Shelby, as his guest got into the buggy beside him, looking at the parcel with much curiosity.

"She said I'm not to open it till we get to the town," replied Mr. Sewall. "It was very kind of her, I'm sure, whatever it is."

"Sphinxy's a girl of few words. Never spoke to you at all till you was leaving, did she?" said Mr. Shelby, touching the lean horse with his hickory switch.

"Not once," answered Mr. Sewall.

At the railway station in the village he opened the parcel containing Sphinxy's gift. It was a little old faded red silk purse, netted in an old-fashioned form, and gleaming through it Mr. Sewall could see two gold pieces.

"Why, this is very kind of your daughter!" he exclaimed, astonished, "but really I can't accept her money. The purse looks like a keepsake, a treasure of her own, too!"

"It is. It belonged to her grandmother, who left it to her when she died, with them two five dollars," said Mr. Shelby, in low tones of much sympathy and tenderness. "Sphinxy thinks the world and all of that money. I reckon she thought, being as you'd come by balloon, going home by train with car fares to pay and so on might come a little awkward to you."

"But you will take it back to her, and explain that I have more than enough to pay my fair to Cincinnati, won't you?" said Mr. Sewall. "And tell her how much I thank her. She is very good and thoughtful."

"Sphinxy is a good girl," said her father, "and she's one that's wonderful set in her own way, two. I don't think," he added, thoughtfully shaking his head, "I don't think she would, to say, really stand it if I should take the purse back to her. No," he said, with determination, "I can't take it back to Sphinxy, Mr. Sewall. She'd take on and cry if I should do such a thing. I know just how that girl thinks, though she never says much.

"She always feels as though nothing's too good for any body that comes to see us, and when any body comes, so to say, right out of the sky, her granny's present's got to go, or Sphinxy wouldn't be Sphinxy. She has had some notion of saving up her chicken and egg money to put with it and buy her a melodeum, but, laws! she'll never do it. She'll just spend all she gets along, for pink calico dresses for every day and white Swiss for Sundays, and there that purse 'll lie in her trunk. Take it along, Mr. Sewall, take it along, do. I really couldn't take it back to her, nohow."

"Well," said Mr. Sewall, reluctantly; then, as a thought came into his mind, he smiled, and put it carefully into his large pocket-book.

"How did you happen to name your daughter Sphinxy?" he asked. "Give her my best thanks, won't you? It's an odd name."

"Yes, rather odd," admitted Mr. Shelby. "But I noticed when she was a little bit of a slip of a thing that she never asked no questions the way her mother does. Perhaps you noticed Mis' Shelby's way. She's a powerful good woman, my wife is, but she can't never seem to stop asking questions, and my girl's just the other way.

"We named her Maria when she was a baby, but when she was about three years old a man come through these parts, peddling reaping-machines. He staid to my place over night, and he told me that he heard say that in the early original Egypt, back there in the old country, there was a race of women what never asked no questions.

"Now them women is called sphinxies, and I says to my wife right off we'd name our little girl that. 'If she'll grow up to be one of them kind of women,' says I, 'that's the best kind of luck I can wish to her husband when she grows up.'

"My wife says—— Oh! there's your train, Mr. Sewall. Got your check all right for that balloon? good! Now do come and see us sometime, and drop down on us whenever you feel like it. Good-bye."

Mr. Sewall wrung Mr. Shelby's hand gratefully, then hurried into his car. From the window he saw the tall figure in blue jeans, the kindly, smiling face, the gesture of affectionate farewell.

About a fortnight later, the young æronaut, whose regular occupation in life was in a large Cincinnati banking-house, where he held a responsible position, received a letter, which he put away, after reading, with two gold pieces in a faded silk purse. It was written on blue-ruled paper with pale ink and signs of a spluttering pen, but it seemed to please Mr. Sewall very much as he read it. This was the letter:

DEAR SIR—Your letter came duly to hand, also the box with the music instrument by frate, which I took home and unloaded, and set it up in the parlor before my wife and Sphinxy see me.

And then in comes Sphinxy and sets down and played a piece she learned of her school-teacher, who has got a melodeum, and she says, as she played her piece: Paw, says she, this is an organ with thirteen stops, and I never sposed I'd ever have a melodeum like teacher, says she. And as to where it came from or any thing about it she never asked no questions.

So no more at present from yours respectfuly, JOSEPH SHELBY.

P. S.—My wife presents her compliments and says tell you we are all very much obliged, and so we are. Sphinxy went to town and bought a piece of sheet music with a song about a balloon man on it, and she sings it every night when she plays on the instrument.

The purse and its contents found their way back to Sphinxy the next summer, but Mr. Sewall keeps the letter.—Minna C. Smith, in Youth's Companion.

EXPLORER STANLEY.

His Latest Achievement Even Grander Than His First Successes.

In the history of exploration and adventure few things are more memorable than the dispatch lately received from Stanley, announcing that he and Emin Pasha are well advanced upon their journey to the east coast of Africa. It is almost a quarter of a century since, to the amazement and admiration of the world, a man previously unknown undertook to find Livingstone, and found him. Of the career thus begun it was a fitting crown that Stanley should determine to rescue Emin, and should triumphantly fulfill his purpose.

We had learned from former dispatches that when Stanley, after accomplishing the long and difficult ascent of the Congo and one of its main affluents, first encountered Emin Pasha, the latter was unwilling to forsake the equatorial province which his self-devotion had carved out of the heart of Africa. Although cut off from Europe by the capture of Khartoum, Emin Pasha continued faithfully to humanize and civilize the people committed to his care, and he had up to that time succeeded in protecting them from Mahdist aggression. Should he abandon them, he knew that they would speedily relapse into savagery and be anew subjected to slave-hunting devastation. He would stay at his post, therefore—so he told Stanley—as long as there was work for him to do.

It is fortunate that Stanley did not take the man, whom he had come to rescue, at his word. Had he done so, and returned to Europe by way of the Congo, we now know that Emin must have shared the fate of Gordon. He retraced his steps, however, only as far as the place where he had left a large deposit of arms and ammunition with his rear guard. Once possessed of these resources, Stanley hastened back to the last surviving representative of the Khedive's authority in Central Africa, but found that in his absence Emin had been made a prisoner by some of his own men, and that the ferocious Mahdists were advancing up the Nile.

From the meager news thus far forthcoming, we know not what measures were taken for the liberation and escape of the heroic Governor. But the measures must have been effectual; Mr. Herbert Ward, who was for several years Stanley's companion in Africa, has no doubt of the correctness of the information.

Both rescuer and rescued deserve the homage of the world. The high aim of Emin's self-consecrating labors and the brilliant gallantry of Stanley's achievement will shine forth on the dark background to which, it is too probable, the heart of Africa is now condemned for many years.—N. Y. Ledger.

The Man Who Marries Money.

The man who seeks a wife for the purpose of securing the means of living without working does not merit the respect of the meanest person on earth. His intentions are so manifest that they deceive no one. He plans his attack with the ingenuity of a General. His is an aggressive courtship, and a hypocritical one as well. He can not afford to let the flame flicker for a moment. He must act the role of deception continually. If there should ever come the moment when a feeling of self-independence and self-respect enters the young woman's mind, his hopes in that instant may be shattered beyond redemption. There is the necessity of ever-present caution and a constant recourse to hypocricy.—Detroit Free Press.

LONG SHOTS.

Wonderful Feats of Marksmanship Performed by Columbian Hunters.

Perhaps no one disciple of Nimrod can point to a like success in the chase as has been experienced by Mr. James Porter, of Thibert Creek, Casslar, who under all circumstances is credited with being a capital shot. While on a hunting excursion during the winter of 1882-3, in company with Mr. Charles Cameron, both of whom were armed with Winchesters, and the cold being forty to fifty degrees below zero, they came upon a band of thirteen cariboo browsing on the bushes which are to be found on the mountains above the timber line. Cameron took one direction, while Porter took a circle to take advantage of a ridge, so that he might get within shot, which he succeeded in doing, and fired his first shot at one hundred and fifty yards, which counted one bagged. The band then started on the run, and before they had got out of reach he had sped twenty-two bullets among them, killing nine and wounding the tenth severely. Night coming on they had to gather the slain, so that the wounded cariboo could not be followed, but when the carcases were skinned it was discovered that the nine were hit nineteen times out of the twenty-two shots fired.

Last winter Mr. Porter, while out with Mr. B. Sullivan on a sporting trip, came on a band of some fifteen or sixteen cariboo on the mountains at the head of Dease creek, and eclipsed all his former feats of marksmanship. Owing to the nature of the mountain side on which they were feeding, Porter could not possibly get nearer to them than five hundred yards, so he quietly adjusted the sight for that range, dropped on one knee, and at the crack of his rifle there was one cariboo less. At the sound of the first shot they commenced running, and before they got out of range, Mr. Sullivan says, there were seven lying at almost equal distances apart. Mr. Porter told the writer that he did not take time to raise his rifle sight as the distance increased, but that he held at the top of the back of the last two which he shot.—Victoria Times.

WEDDING PRESENTS.

An Ancient Custom Observed by the Greeks and Romans.

The custom of giving wedding presents, as it now exists, is a social tax which, though paid by every one, is only paid grudgingly and on compulsion. It represents neither affection nor interest, and is not productive of the smallest profit to any save the manufacturers whose wares are sold for the purpose. History does not say much about wedding presents, except as to the presents of the bridegroom and the bride given to each other. The Greeks, we read, always presented a newly-married couple with a basket of acorns mixed with bread. They gave household furniture besides, according to their feelings, admiration running to a four-post bedstead, while respect contented itself with a footstool; but acorns were compulsory, and were to the Greeks what the tea pot is to us. Why acorns we do not know; but every thing those people did was emblematical. If they coughed it was highly emblematical, and if they stabbed their friends through the back, or a man ran away with his wife, it was still emblematical, so that, no doubt, both giver and receiver perfectly understood one another, and their acorns found their way to the pigs and the bread to the chickens, with benefit all around. Among the Romans, whom we could no more afford to lose than the Greeks, the relations and friends of the newly-married pair, we are told, were very great at parting with nuts at the marriage festival. The nuts in this case were also obligatory; the present-giver might throw in a toga, or an electro plated chariot, or a fasces for the back-pocket if he liked, but the nuts he must disburse. The nuts again were emblematic of something serious, though historians have not yet made up their minds exactly what. Cracking nuts is still a standing pastime with the youth of certain classes even in our own day, and the custom probably has the above weighty sanction. But beyond the acorns and nuts we have nothing very definite as to what was expected of friends and relations in the way of presents.—Chicago Tribune.

MADE HIS FORTUNE.

How a French Comedienne Enriched a Silk Manufacturer.

The formal announcement that the latest styles for ladies' costumes are to be chiefly distinguished for the striking colors employed in the stuffs out of which they are made, recalls to mind a little anecdote told of Mlle. Mars, the once famous comedienne—an anecdote which explains how the same fashion was artfully forced upon the world some sixty or seventy years ago. The actress was fulfilling an engagement at Lyons, when one day the chief silk manufacturer of the town was ushered into her presence.

"Mademoiselle," said he, "I demand of you to make my fortune."

"Monsieur, nothing would give me greater pleasure, but how am I to do so?"

"Simply by accepting from me this piece of cloth, by having it made into a dress and wearing it in your next representation in Paris." And at the same time he unfolded a package which he held in his hand and spread it before the actress. It was a piece of the most brilliant and screaming yellow, as the blondes would say—intense, barbaric, soul-stirring! At first the actress refused—she could never commit such an act of audacity and hope to live through it; but at last she was prevailed upon to make the trial. The experiment succeeded beyond the crafty merchant's wildest hopes. In less than a week all Paris was frantically pursuing the latest phantasy of its favorite star. The Lyons manufacturer, who alone had a sufficient stock on hand, was soon overflowed with orders. And the fashion for bright colors thus oddly begun endured for several seasons.—*Paris Cor. TOO OLD TO LEARN.

A Popular Phase Whose Sentiment Is Not Founded on Truth.

How often do we hear the expression, "Too old to learn," or the same idea in the ungainly proverb, "You can't teach an old dog new tricks!" However true this may be of the canine species, it is not true of mankind, particularly of his intellect. Convicts, who, prior to their imprisonment never labored ten consecutive hours have by enforced discipline developed into fair workmen. The old experienced mechanic is ever on the alert for improved tools, and does not hesitate to use them, even if it requires different postures or manipulations, and equally so with the surgeon. When, however, we consider the wonderful capabilities of man's intellect we find "that too old to learn" is often a cloak for laziness, and that the real difficulty is a lack of patience and application.

Because a full-grown man can lift with ease a burden that a little child can hardly stir, or because his powers of comprehension are better developed, he thinks he ought to acquire in a few days what it took a child years to learn. From the day that the child began his alphabet to the hour that he can intelligently and understandingly read an ordinary newspaper often covers four or five years; but the child is compelled to bestow so much time each day upon his books, and certain results are exacted; and to this enforced system, as much as to the receptive condition of his mind, does the child owe his intellectual gain. Were many who have been deprived of early advantages to adopt a systematic course of study and adhere to it, they would soon accomplish what they now regard as impossible.

Those who have read the Count of Monte Cristo remember Edmund Dantes and his teacher, the Abbe Busoni, and how afterwards he utilized his late acquired learning. Some years since a very young man was sent to the penitentiary in one of our Eastern States who was barely able to read. He read the story of Dantes, and appreciating the defects in his own education, he resolved to cure them, if possible. Among his fellow prisoners was a clergyman who had not done right, and a lawyer who had gone wrong. Availing himself of these men's attainments, he studied perseveringly, and when his sentence expired he went forth a well-informed man. When Rome came under the rule of Victor Emmanuel night schools were established, and when the prizes were awarded, the first prize was taken by a man thirty years of age. When we begin to gather up incidents where men have made up their early deficiencies we come across names somewhat famous. Every schoolboy is familiar with the story of Cato, who commenced the study of Greek at an advanced age. Boccacio, although a fine classical scholar, first turned his attention to writing in Tuscan when about forty. Alfieri, the founder of the Italian school of tragedy, led an aimless and dissolute life until about twenty-seven years of age, then he began a severe course of study. Besides his fourteen tragedies he translated Virgil and Terence, and at the age of fifty began the study of Greek. Of his tragedies it has been said: "Their literary rank is permanent." Ogilby was past fifty when he began his classical studies, but his translation of Homer was a favorite with so good a poet and critic as Pope.

William Cobbett, a private soldier, at twenty-five studied grammar, and afterwards became a famous writer, whose terse and vigorous English is worthy of imitation. The late President Garfield, even after he had entered public life, did not hesitate to acquire a good working knowledge of French and German, that he might the better understand some treatises on finance in those languages. The late W. H. Hunt, at one time Minister to Russia, surprised his friends by his progress in that almost unlearnable tongue—Russian. The list might be extended, but enough cases have been shown to break the force of the cry, "Too old to learn." Let no one, however, neglect his present opportunities, but rather from those incidents feel the importance of the present, and the possibilities of the future. After all, perseverance is another name for genius, and ignorance is much more easily cured than most people suspect.—James T. Hubbell, in Christian at Work.

COMFORTABLE SEATS.

Why Experienced Travelers Prefer the Middle Seats in a Car.

A very common theme of conversation among travelers is the question of whether or not a car rides easier in the middle than above the trucks. One of our railroad contemporaries some time ago published an article on the subject, and took the ground that there could be no difference, unless the sills and framing of a car yielded like the buckboard of a wagon. There is certainly no yield to car sills and framing; yet every old traveler avoids the seats, and especially the sleeping berths, above the trucks, and old travelers generally know what they are doing. If the party who insisted that there could be no difference in the motion in different parts of the same car had ever crossed the stormy ocean in a moderately long steamer he might have received some enlightment, especially if sea-sickness urged him to find the point of least motion. It is well-known that there is less motion amidships than there is at the stem or stern, and less motion at the bottom of the vessel than there is on deck. A car acts in a similar way. Any thing defective about the track jerks the wheels, which transmit the irregular motion to the truck, and that in turn to the body of the coach.—Railway World.

—A petition signed by many thousands of person will be presented to the Legislature of Oregon next winter, asking the enactment of a law to prohibit liquor-sellers from placing screens before their doors, or frosting or shading their windows so as to protect the "business" from the public view.—Chicago Times.

—At the recent session of the Dominion Parliament thirty-five railroads were subsidized, some to the extent of $3,200 cash a mile, and others received 6,400 acres of land a mile.

THE UPAS TREE.

It Is Not Near So Poisonous as Has Been Described.

"Perhaps more fabulous tales have been told concerning poisonous qualities of the death-dealing (?) upas trees of Java than of any other tree which has an actual existence. Accounts of this tree were first given to the public by Dr. Foersch, a surgeon in the Dutch East India Company's employ in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Foersch published several extraordinary accounts of this "deadly upas," one in particular, which appeared in a book giving the intrepid M. D.'s experience while exploring the islands of Java in 1783. In course of his narrative he said that criminals condemned to die were compelled to go and gather its poisonous leaves, and that not more than two out of each twenty sent out on the journey ever returned to tell the tale of how, overcome by its deadly emanations, they had laid themselves down to never again awaken. The very birds that flew over the valley in which this deadly vegetable monster grew, according to this Haggard of the eighteenth century, fell fluttering into the branches of the tree, only to die among the poisonous foliage or upon the bone-strewn ground beneath. He also relates how an army of 1,600 men camped one night about 14 miles from where the upas grew, and that only 300 answered to the morning roll call, 1,300 of them having perished during the night by the wind changing and silently wafting the deadly vapors over the sleeping multitude.

The facts in regard to the trees are these: It grows in the forest with other trees, and attains a height of about one hundred feet. The juice of the bark is somewhat posionous to the human skin, but not more so than that of the poison sumac, or even the three-leaved ivy. It is evident that Foersch confounded the horrors of "Death's valley," another of the natural curiosities of Java, with the legendary stories told of the upas tree. The poison gases in the valley above mentioned escapes from the ground, and are not the emanations of any tree, fanciful stories notwithstanding. — St. Louis Republic.

REMARKABLE TRIALS.

Mice, Worms and Hogs Sentenced to Death According to Legal Forms.

The first cases of animal trials of which we have any account was when the Bishop of Leon issued his injunction against the caterpillars and field mice. The mice and worms had been eating up their crop and the county sued them and won the suit, hence the injunction that they should stop. In criminal cases the mode of trial was similar to that prevailing to-day. The animal which had committed the crime was arrested and put in prison. The prosecuting attorney heard and committed to writing all the testimony in the case, and if the animal was convicted of being guilty of some heinous crime—say homicide for an instance—the judge pronounced the sentence, which was that the animal be hung by the neck or legs, according to the nature of the animal, until he was dead.

An example of a sentence is found in the "Annuaire du Department de l'Aisne," which was pronounced on a hog, June 14, 1494, for devouring a child. It concludes thus: "We, in detestation and horror of this crime, and in order to make an example and satisfy justice, have declared, judged, sentenced, pronounced and appointed that the said hog, now detained in the abbey as prisoner, shall, by the executioner, be hung and strangled on a gibbet, near the gallows which now stands within the jurisdiction of the monks whose names are appended, being near the copyhold of Avin. In witness of which we have sealed this present with our seal."

This remarkable document, now in the museum at Paris, is labeled: "Sentence on a hog executed by justice, in the copyhold of Clarmont-Avin, and strangled on a gibbet at the place last above mentioned." It is sealed with red wax and kept under a glass case.—St. Louis Republic.

BOOTS AT A BARGAIN.

She was as gentle of eye as a soft gazelle, that is, she was, for this didn't happen this week. It was in a shoe store in Lewiston, and the gentle maiden was an acquaintance of the proprietor and always bought her No. 2's there when she encased her dainty foot in any thing brand new. "Here's something that would fit you," said the jocular proprietor, passing out a pair of wool boots fitted with a pair of lumberman's rubbers. "I'll make you a present of them if you will wear them down to the post-office and back."

"Wait a minute," said she, and in a "minute" she was arrayed in woolen boots and lumberman's rubbers. "Watch me to the post-office," and she was gone.

"Her feet beneath her petticoat, like little mice, stole in and out as if they feared the light," wrote the poet two hundred years ago, but he didn't refer to the Lewiston young lady who did this feat on foot, or he never would have said it. She was back in less than ten minutes, red-checked and laughing.

"There," said she, as she passed up the boots. "Do them up. I'll send them to my father down in Penobscot County. I never lose a chance to help the folks at home," and the shoe-dealer was as good as his word, and "dad" marveled at the pair of nice wool boots from his thoughtful daughter in Lewiston.—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

Ex-Speakers of the House.

Although there are only two ex-Presidents living—Hayes and Cleveland—and but one ex-Vice-President—Hamlin—there are seven ex-Speakers. These are Robert C. Winthrop, N. P. Banks, Galusha A. Grow, James G. Blaine, Samuel J. Randall, J. Warren Keifer and John G. Carlisle. Winthrop reached the Speakership forty-two years ago, during the presidency of James K. Polk, and Banks, who stands next on the list in remoteness of date of choice, attained the post when Pierce was in the White House. While fate has played cruel pranks with the presidential aspirations of ex-Speakers, the old scythe-bearer certainly "stands in" with them.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

ABOUT MARRIAGE.

Some Plain Talk to Women by One of the Most Noted of Their Sex.

Whether they are sufficiently honest to acknowledge it or not, ninety-nine girls out of every hundred look forward to marriage as a matter of course. It would be better for them and for their future husbands were this taken into account in the training of girls, and without teaching that a single life must be empty and unsatisfactory, yet instruct them that, as matrimony will probably be their destiny, they should fit themselves for it, not only by training in domestic duties, but by the study of gentleness, forbearance and unselfishness.

A blessed provision of nature often overlooked is the change worked in a woman's disposition by love. If the sentiment be worthy of the name, the deep, strong affection from which alone marriage should spring, and not a mere passing fancy, the tendencies will be to awaken all that is best and noblest in the heart. "Old things are passed away, all things are become new." Looked at by this fresh, true light, little deprivations, petty economies, small sacrifices—and even large ones—become a burden to be embraced and enjoyed for the sake of the one with whom they are shared.

Occasionally a wife may be found who is sufficiently devoid of womanliness and generosity as to sigh over the immunity from care she knew before her marriage and to reproach the husband of her choice with his inability to provide her with the luxuries she craves. Such a creature, however, would not have been improved by wealth. Sometimes prosperity seems to have a sweetening and ennobling effect upon natures which adversity has narrowed and hardened, but as a rule those who can not stand poverty without becoming embittered are not fit for riches.

The custom of early marriages has, perhaps wisely, fallen into disuse. The title of "old maid" is no longer conferred upon a woman who remains single until twenty-five. More girls marry within a year or two after that age than five years before it. There are both advantages and disadvantages in the former system. Youthful judgement is prone to be harsh and unsparing, and it may well be questioned whether the larger proportion of happy marriages are not those formed after twenty-three rather than earlier.

Another objection to boy and girl matches is that they are likely to be the result of accident instead of choice. The fancy is readily captivated when one has seen little of the world, and many a man or woman in later life shrinks with repugnance from a marriage which seemed altogether desirable when neither was out of the teens. Exceptions to this only prove the rule. Its truth may be attested by the fact that there is not one man or woman out of fifty who will not acknowledge having been the victim of some youthful flame of which the memory brings no pang, but only a sensation of amusement slightly tinctured with disgust. The youthful love is very real, too—while it lasts—and causes such alternations of bliss and misery as to fairly persuade the sufferers that it is the right thing. But it differs as completely from the affection of riper years as do the stumbling, tottering steps of a child from the firm, assured tread of a man.

The early marriages of our grandparents are sometimes quoted in justification of the practice, but times have changed since then. In spite of the bustle and hurry that make ten years of the nineteenth century equal to forty of the seventeenth, the age at which young men and women conclude their scholastic education and launch themselves into the world of business or pleasure is steadily growing later. Boys' and girls' colleges are increasing the age at which pupils are admitted. It used to be thought nothing unusual for a youth to begin his collegiate course at fourteen; now it is equally common for him to postpone his matriculation until he is seventeen or eighteen. Few girls are graduated from finishing schools or seminaries under ninteen or twenty, while those who take a regular college course continue their routine of study even later. The girl wants her swing in society before she settles down to married life, while the man has his business or profession to acquire and his position to gain in the world before he can seriously contemplate taking unto himself a wife.

If a special training be necessary in the preparation of a woman for marriage, it is no less important for a man. This is a fact that is generally overlooked. A great deal is said about the beauty of gentleness and unselfishness in a woman, and of the need of her possession of these qualities in making true home happiness. But unless these facts are glaringly apparent in a man they rarely provoke adverse criticism. The question is sometimes asked upon the announcement of an engagement, "Is he good enough for her?" but his peccadilloes are seldom submitted to the keen examination to which hers are subjected.

It is a common habit to lay the blame upon a woman's shoulders if a home is not peaceful and happy, except in cases where the husband's well-known vices preclude this. Even then there are always censors ready to hint that if the woman had made domestic life all it should be she would probably have less cause for complaint. While open courses of extravagance, intemperance or infidelity are cruelly hard to bear, there are other less palpable trials that are nearly as wearing. The tricks of speech, manner and conduct that offend in a woman are equally distressing in a man. The habit of carelessness, the gradual falling away of the minor courtesies of word and bearing that marked the betrothal days are felt keenly by those women who suffer from them, although pride and loyalty may alike prevent complaint.—Christian Terhune Herrick, in Philadelphia Press.

FRIDAY MARCH 21 1890

County Official Paper.

To preserve liberty it is necessary to cultivate patriotism. No better way of doing that can be found than by teaching the young what the heroic men of past times have done and suffered in defense of freedom. It is a special duty of the Grand Army of the Republic to teach lessons of patriotism now, as the members practiced it in the past. Several old soldiers express a strong desire that the Post at Independence should at once take some steps for a fitting observation of the approaching anniversary, sacred to the memory of the martyrs of freedom who gave their lives for their country in the war of the rebellion. Decoration day is not less worthy of observation than the Fourth of July.

If the plan proposed by Senator Stanford, of the Government loaning money on land security, should become a law there would be a great decrease in the rates of interest. For this reason every money lender will bitterly oppose such a plan. The money lenders assert that it would not be wise or safe to loan National money on land security, and yet there is no class of security more eagerly sought after by money lenders than mortgages on land. There is not a money lender in the United States but would, if he could, persuade every other money lender that it is not safe to loan money on land; each one of them would like to have a monopoly of so safe and profitable a business For the same reason they will all join in trying to prevent the enactment of such a law as Senator Stanford suggests.

Sound Sleepers.

Mr. Boyle says that it is one of the amusements of West Africa to show strangers how a Fantee boy can sleep. A friend of his wishing to rouse some servants and send them to close the shutters and lock the doors, said to him, "I'll show you something which you wouldn't believe on hearsay."

Thereon he grasped a boy by the heels, dragged him a yard or so, turned him over, and roughly lifted him to a sitting posture; the youth sat up, rubbed his eyes, scratched his head, and went to sleep again as he lay. To another he did the same, with a like result.

Having thus got the two alongside, fast asleep, he dragged one on top of the other, and left them a moment; they slumbered placidly in that position. He then ran amuck at them, being in slippers, and upset the pair, and ordered them loudly to close the shutters. They both got up, eyes wide open, and apparently conscious; one walked gravely down stairs, the other retired, with all semblance of reason, to the pantry alongside.

The one who went down came up again in two minutes, still with his eyes wide open, and leisurely lay down to sleep again; the other we found fast snoozing in the pantry on a stool. We took them up, and shook them violently; they rubbed themselves, and went to sleep again.

Dragging them into the dining room, without a word, they silently set about their work, fastening shutters and doors.

"Do you think they are awake?" asked my friend. "Tell them to get you something."

I did so. No response. I repeated the order. They quietly went back, their work completed, and dropped to sleep upon their mats, fast stupefied with sleep all the time.—Youth's Companion.

Natural Gas in Indiana.

Some idea of the vast importance of the natural gas interests of Indiana may be gained from a study of the report recently made by the state geologist. He has been collecting all the information he could possibly get concerning the subject, and from the results of his investigation we learn that the gas area of Indiana is 165 miles in length by 65 miles in width; altogether there are 381 paying wells in the district. The entire flow of gas is placed at 600,000,000 feet of which, it is calculated, something like 1,000,000 feet go to waste. The average flow of gas from each well is stated as being about 150,000 feet. The report further mentions the fact that during the past two years seventy-nine manufactories have located in Indiana, simply and solely because of the fact that they could obtain this fuel. Their combined capital is stated, in Fire and Water, as reaching $4,500,000, and it is said that they will employ 5,800 men.—Scientific American.

Strangulation Produces Coloration.

The question is asked why the face of a person who is strangled turns black? An answer to this is as follows: Blood is of two kinds, arterial or bright blood, and venous or dark blood. The brilliant color of the arterial blood is due to oxygen which it carries from the lungs to the tissues; these rob it of its charge, and it hurries back to the lungs as dark venous blood for more. If this regular course of nature is arrested by strangulation, which means the compression of the jugular vein, the venous blood is retained above the ligature and becomes less and less oxygenated. If the ligature is very tight the carotid arteries will also be blocked, and no more arterial blood will reach the head and face. And so the result of strangulation is blackness, or rather purpleness, of the face—the outcome of an excess of venous blood and deficiency of oxygenation.—New York Telegram.

JUMPING DOWN A MOUNTAIN.

Snowshoe Thompson's Remarkable Leap of 180 Feet.

The sport of "ski," or snowshoe running, so long popular in the Sierra Nevada mountains, is beginning to be practiced in some of the northern of the Atlantic states. An eastern exchange says: "Ski running, a Scandinavian sport, is becoming popular in Minnesota. The performer slides down hill on long wooden skates, or foot toboggans, and at a prepared jolt makes a leap into space. Ninety-five feet is the longest ski jump on record in Norway.

Ninety-five feet seems a immense leap, but it has been so far surpassed in the Sierras that no easterner need ever try for the championship. The champion ski runner and leaper of the world was John A. Thompson—better known as "Snowshoe Thompson"—who died in Alpine county, Cal., about thirteen years ago.

Thompson was born at Upper Tina, Prestijeld, Norway, April 30, 1827, and died at his home in the Sierras May 15, 1876. He was the father of the whole race of snowshoe runners of the mountain counties of California. He made the first pair of Norwegian snowshoes ever seen on the Pacific coast.

Thompson's greatest leap was made on the side of a steep mountain just west of the town of Genoa, Douglas county. Darting down the side of the steep mountain he made a leap of 180 feet. This leap is vouched for by W. P. Merrill, postmaster at Woodfords, in the high Sierras, and by several citizens of Genoa. The leap was made from a terrace half way down the side of the mountain, and the leaper landed in a drift of snow over fifty feet in depth, where for a time he was buried out of sight.

C. P. Gregory (now deceased), who was for some years neighbor to Snowshoe Thompson in the mountains, said, in speaking of the feats of the great ski leaper: "I did not see him make his great jump off the side of the mountain back of Genoa, but I have often seen him make leaps of fifty and sixty feet at Silver Mountain, Alpine county."

The people of Silver Mountain mining camp were wont to amuse themselves in winter by descending a big mountain near the town and then darting down to a valley below on their snowshoes. They had a starting point only about half way up the side of the mountain. Snowshoe Thompson sometimes joined these parties of ski runners. He was not satisfied with a run down half a mountain—he wanted it all.

He would circle round till he had reached the hightest peak of the big mountain. He would then utter the wild war cry of the old Northmen, and then with his balance pole poised horizontally before him in both hands, would come flying down the side of the mountain like a fiend of the wind. When he came near to the crowd of townspeople standing midway down the mountain, Thompson would stoop almost to the ground, then suddenly springing up would go sailing through the air high above the men and women watching the descent. At times he would make several leaps, each of from fifty to eighty feet in a single descent. His ski leaping was not a little like "sky flying."

Snowshoe Thompson was a very sinewy and powerful man. He stood six feet in his stockings and weighed 180 pounds. He had the blonde hair and beard and the blue eyes of his Scandinavian ancestors, the old sea roving Northmen.—Virginia City Enterprise.

Money in little Things.

"One of the best opportunities for a young fellow to make money quickly in these days," said a self made millionaire of this city recently, "is to rack his brains until he has invented something useful or that the public wants. A general impression prevails that it takes a skilled engineer or a man of phenomenal inventive ability to develop anything useful to manufacturers in this age of machinery. But there is a wide field open to shrewd amateurs, so to speak, to supply little articles of convenience to housekeepers, shopkeepers, etc., and designers can be had at reasonable rates to execute the idea once it is conceived. American women are so accustomed to getting what they want that anything which lightens their labors in the household is sure to 'go.' When I was a boy on the farm at home my mother used to make me clean all the dinner knives on Sunday with bath brick. Now, scraping this brick into a fine powder without lumps in it, used to be the most tedious part of the whole work. The other day I heard of a man who has made a fortune by supplying the trade with powdered bath bricks in neat packages. You know how difficult it is to pick up small coins from a wooden counter. Yet the whole civilized world has growled at and endured it since coins were stamped and counters made, until the other day a young fellow invented a rubber mat with little bristles of rubber standing up thickly all over it. Coins thrown on the mat are as easily picked up as if they stood on edge. The public was quick to appreciate it and the inventor need not work for a living any longer.—New York Tribune.

Seasick on Land and Sea.

Gen. Horace Porter, in his eulogy of Abraham Lincoln, said that the great war president wasn't much as a champagne drinker. The general recalled a visit of Mr. Lincoln to City Point. On his arrival the general said that Mr. Lincoln was suffering from the gastronomic disturbances incident to most folks who have sailed on rough water. "A young staff officer, very previous he was," said the general, "grabbed a bottle of champagne and thrust it toward Mr. Lincoln, saying that that was the very thing he needed. 'No, young man,' Mr. Lin-oln said, 'I have seen too many fellows seasick ashore from drinking that very article.'"—Detroit Free Press.

Niagara Falls Measurements.

The following are the latest statistics concerning the cataract. The outline of the American falls is about 1,000 feet, and the height about 165 feet. The descent in the rapids above the American fall is about 40 feet to the half mile. The outline of the Horseshoe fall is about 2,600 feet, the height about 158 feet, and the descent in the rapid above about 55 feet to three-quarters of a mile. The volume of water passing over both falls is about 15,000,000 cubic feet per minute, or about one cubic mile per week, or 54 cubic miles per year.—Buffalo Courier.

A National Flower.

More than ten years ago the writer made a suggestion concerning a national flower and referred to the favorites of other nations. It attracted the attention of a few botanists at the time and there the matter rested. Of late the subject has been revived and various flowers have been mentioned. Many of them have only a local reputation, or are to be found only in small quantities and in certain sections of the United States. Like Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, whose poem all must remember, I desire to recommend the Golden Rod.

It is found in all parts of the United States, and, the botanists tell us, in a hundred varieties. The Golden Rod is far from being the "coarse looking herb" which Webster defines it, but is beautiful in every type, from the tall spikes on our wave washed shores to the delicate fern like blossoms which defy the artist's skill.

As America is called the "Land of Gold," and is rich in resources, why not take this royal blossom for our floral emblem? It represents strength, beauty, brilliancy, and infinite variety, with powers of endurance calculated to challenge admiration.—Detroit Free Press.

DIED.

HARGER—Near Bishop, March 14th, Mrs. Harger, wife of J. D. Harger.

—No family ever suffered severer loss by death than fell upon Mr. Harger and children when wife and mother passed away. Mrs. Harger was seized with an attack of grippe some weeks ago and physicians were unable to arrest the disease and it resulted in her death on Friday morning of last week. Mrs. Harger was a woman dearly beloved, not only by her husband and children, but by all who knew her best. The high es imation in which she was held was evidenced by the very large attendance at the funeral, and by the expressions of heartfelt sympathy tendered the family by many who had known and loved the deceased.

Mr. John E. Jones, of Round Valley, was in town this week.

Mr. T. C. Boland has been in town several days this week.

Mr. Valentine Sherman was down from Bishop on Wednesday.

W. S. Enos returned home from a visit to the lower country last week.

Mr. Kermode, who taught school at Lone Pine last term, is now teaching at Paleto, Kern county.

Mr. Thomas W. Hill has been appointed Postmaster at Big Pine, vice Mr. A. K Eugley, term expired.

Mr. Horace Bellows finished shearing his Angora goats last week. The clip is large and the mohair of fine quality.

About thirty people drove up from Bishop to Benton last Monday to attend the celebration of St. Patrick's Day given there.

A cave in the tunnel through the White Mountains blockaded the C. & C. road from Saturday morning until Tuesday of this week.

Mr. F. S. Raymond of Coyote Holes was at the Land Office at Independence this week. He has made some locations of land at that place.

It is estimated that about one million young orange trees will be set out this season in the orange growing regions of Southern California.

The Independence bridge across Owens river is now so far completed as to permit teams to pass over it. All that remains to be done now is finishing the railing on each side.

Stockmen will begin the Spring rodeo next week down about Little Lake and Salt Wells Valley. The cattle look well and the prospects for a good feed season are first rate.

Real estate has been lively for the last few days. Likewise tin cans and everything else that's loose. The gentle Spring zephyrs are getting in their work in good shape.

The young people of Independence had a very pleasant party last Monday evening at the Pavilion. Sheet and pillow case masks were worn and the disguises afforded a good deal of amusement.

An English company has purchased the Gage property, near San Bernardino. The purchase contains 6,000 acres of land, a canal and water right. The land is to be settled by English farmers.

H. H. Spears passed through town last Monday with a twelve horse team loaded with general merchandise from Los Angeles, and was nearly all for Bishop. He had to wait four days at Mojave for the goods.

Mr. F. E. Bosworth, the jeweler and photographer, is in the lowe end of the valley. He is taking fine pictures at all the public schools, the children being arranged in groups. He will repair all kinds of watches, clocks and jewelry and will be at Independence in a few days.

All lines of business are reported to be very dull in Los Angeles and have been so the whole winter. The great interruption of travel by storms has prevented the usual number of Eastern people from going to that city. There will not be any great revival of business till a railroad from Salt Lake reaches Los Angeles.

A dozen years ago Unionville was one of the liveliest towns in Nevada. Its prosperity was due to the Arizona mine and when bad management ruined the mine the town followed suit. Booth & Wheeler of Sacramento finally got possession of the mine. They ran a long tunnel in new ground and are reported to have struck an ore body that is fully equal to the best found in the mine in its palmiest days. It is expected that Unionville will again be a prosperous town.

Nevada State Board of Trade.

RENO, Nevada, March 14th, 1890.

ED. INDEPENDENT: Dear Sir:—We have sent copies of the enclosed letter to the Supervisors of all counties of California lying east of the Sierras. I trust you will lend your valuable aid in inducing them to coöperate with us in the work of the Board of Trade. Yours respectfully,

ALLEN C. BRAGG,
Secretary.

TO THE HONORABLE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF INYO COUNTY: Gentlemen:—At a meeting of the Nevada State Board of Trade held on Saturday last the President and Secretary were instructed to write and invite you to coöperate with us in promoting the general prosperity of Nevada and that part of California lying east of the Sierras.

Inasmuch as your geographical position leaves you out of the "citrus belt" your interests are identical with ours, and what promotes our welfare is equally advantageous to you.

The first object of the Board of Trade is a permanent effort to induce a reinforcement of industrial population.

Second, to encourage the people of any section of the country to develop the resources of that section.

Third, to give information to those seeking investment of capital.

Fourth, to give information to intending settlers.

Fifth, to collect information concerning agriculture, mineral and other resources of the country.

Sixth, to discuss the general good of the commonwealth.

Seventh, to inaugurate movements in legislation, both State and National.

Eighth, to bring into coöperative relation the mind, muscle and capital of a community, and to give the efforts to induce immigration and develop the resources of the State intelligent direction.

With these objects in view we think it will be apparent to your Honorable Board that it is clearly in your interest to coöperate with us to promote the general prosperity of the country lying without the "citrus belt."

We cordially invite you to join with us in the grand movement and let us see if we cannot bring about a better condition of affairs. Our annual dues for members has been placed at $5.00. If this proposition should meet with your approval arrangements will be made for giving your section of the country a place on the Board of Directors.

We should be pleased to hear from you on the subject and answer any questions that may arise. Yours respectfully,

WM. THOMPSON, Vice-President. ALLEN C. BRAGG, Secretary.

Impractical.

It looks as if the parties who are surveying south of Olancha contemplate cutting a canal that would carry the waters of Owens Lake down into Little Lake Canyon. About seven miles south of Owens Lake the canyon descends all the way to Salt Wells Valley and all that would be necessary would be to make an embankment here and there to prevent the water from spreading over flat places. Salt Wells Valley is about twenty-five miles long by twenty wide and the land is good. The water of Owens Lake is entirely unfit for irrigation in its present condition; in fact it kills vegetation as surely as vitriol would do it. But it is argued that if a current was kept flowing steadily out of the lake it would eventually become fresh and fit for all purposes. How long it would take a body of water eighteen miles long and twelve wide to change so much in character remains to be seen. Other parties have rights in the lake whose value depends upon the character of the water remaining unchanged and an invasion of such rights might lead to serious complications. To those who are familiar with the country this scheme—if the purpose of the survey be correctly reported—appears to be altogether impracticable. The depth to be cut at the deepest point would be great, probably not less than one hundred and fifty feet, and the length of heavy cutting—not all quite so deep—would be about five miles. In all probability the guessing as to the real purpose of the surveys is all wrong, and there is nothing but guessing, as the surveyors do not see fit to tell what their purpose is if, indeed, they know what end their employers have in view.

Mining Notes.

At Cerro Gordo the Union shaft is now timbered down to a depth of seven hundred feet. The shaft extends two hundred feet below this depth but it is understood that no more timbering will be done at present. This timbering has been a difficult and consequently a slow and expensive job. Prospecting is now going on from the 700-foot level but up to the latest report no new ore body had yet been found, though but very little prospecting has yet been done. On the east side of the mountain a few men were put to work some time ago opening up one of the old mines belonging to the company. Nothing is yet reported of anything discovered there.

There is nothing new at Darwin. By the jigging process a good deal of paying ore continues to be taken from the old dumps at the Defiance mine. There is enough of this in sight to yield a very large quantity of paying ore. In the mine about six men are reported to be kept at work prospecting. Ore continues to be taken from the Lucky Jim in about the usual quantity.

Good Ground to Prospect.

A. J. Davis and Pat Key went up into the Inyo mountains about three weeks ago prospecting. They have found a vein of galena ore that runs from eight inches to eighteen inches in thickness. The ore carries one hundred and twenty ounces silver per ton and about eighty per cent. lead. This makes the ore worth about one hundred and seventy-two dollars per ton. For two months work they will take out at least ten tons of the ore, worth seventeen hundred and twenty dollars. Deducting from this the cost of packing, freight and working the ore say three hundred and fifty dollars and the two men will have thirteen hundred and seventy dollars for their two months work. This is not by any means the only instance of the kind in the White hill district; as good and even better results have been attained in that locality time and time again. The Inyo mountains offer a good field for prospectors.

St. Patrick's Day at Keeler.

A large party attended the St. Patrick's Day celebration at Keeler and a more jolly or pleasanter party never met in the Valley. The hearty welcome given everybody by Mr. and Mrs. Barnes made the visitors feel happy and from arrival to departure not one but felt that every moment was full of pleasure. Messrs. Reynolds and Grunow gave good music and while the young danced with enjoyment more than usual, the older ones danced with all the vigor of youth. The company sat down to supper at midnight and lingered long at tables spread with every good thing that money could buy and skill prepare in ways to tempt the appetite. In a word, St. Patrick's day at Keeler was an entire success.

It is said that the reduction works at Reno, recently destroyed by fire, will be rebuilt. When the works were first opened for business a few shipments of ore were sent there from Inyo county; but for some reason the results were not satisfactory to our miners and all orders were again sent to San Francisco, as before. If the works should be rebuilt it is to be hoped that such improvements will be made as will induce our miners to send their ores there rather than to San Francisco.

A man named Juan Vaca died at Lone Pine last week. About sixteen years ago a Deputy Sheriff was murdered in Kern county. Recently the murderer was discovered and arrested. Vaca was the only eye witness to the killing; his testimony was not taken and now it may not be possible to convict the accused. Vaca lived with an Indian woman; after his death she said, "I heap sorry, cry like h—ll."

The State officers refused to take any more of the county bonds than are now held by the State, $34,000. Mr. Moore, the County Treasurer, says Governor Waterman strongly opposed taking the bonds, his objection presumably being that the rate of interest proposed for refunding is too low. The Attorney-General is now at Washington and nothing definite will be done until he returns to Sacramento.

The furnace recently built at Keeler for converting crude soday into soda ash works very successfully. It has a capacity of twenty to twenty-five tons per day. The ash is fully equal to the best imported; it contains 54 per cent. of alkali, the standard brands of imported ash containing but 48 to 52 per cent. alkali. The ash is largely used in making glass and for many other purposes.

At Shepherds' ranch a very large quantity of hay is already baled and the baling machine is kept steadily at work. The hay is of excellent quality, alfalfa and timothy, and is always in demand. With the raising of horses and mules and the big crops of hay the Shepherds, father and son, have the best paying ranch in Inyo county. It is a fine property and well managed.

Last Monday a young man came to Independence and got a marriage license. He stayed in town over night and had a jolly time. Next day he offered his license to several parties at a discount of half a dollar but could not find a buyer. The old bachelors of Independence are a hardened lot when such an offer as this failed to make any of them invest in a license.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

"Good-by," she answered, as she gave him her shaking hands. "Good-by, my dear. If only you knew what I feel here," she pointed to her breast, "you would make excuses for me." Almost before she had finished her sentence he was gone. She stood near the door, listening to his retreating footsteps till they had quite died away, and then flung herself in the chair and rested her head upon her hands. "I shall lose him," she said to herself in the bitterness of her heart. "I know I shall. What chance have I against her? He already cares for Ida a great deal more than he does for me. In the end he will break from me and marry her some time. Oh, I had rather see him dead and myself too."

Half an hour later Mr. Quest came in.

"Where is Cossey?" he asked.

"Mr. Cossey's father has had a stroke of paralysis, and he has gone up to London to look after him."

"Oh," said Mr. Quest. "Well, if the old gentlemen dies, your friend will be one of the wealthiest men in England."

"Well, so much the better for him. I am sure money is a great blessing. It protects one from so much."

"Yes," said Mr. Quest, with emphasis, "so much the better for him, and all connected with him. Why have you been crying? Because Cossey has gone away—or have you quarreled with him?"

"How do you know that I have been crying? If I have, it's my affair. At any rate my tears are my own."

"Certainly they are—I do not wish to interfere with your crying—cry when you like. It will be lucky for Cossey if that old father of his dies just now, because he wants money."

"What does he want money for?"

"Because he has undertaken to pay off the mortgages on the castle estate."

"Why has he done that—as an investment?"

"No, it is a rotten investment. I believe he has done it because he is in love with Miss de la Molle, and is naturally anxious to ingratiate himself with her. Don't you know that? I thought perhaps that was what you had been crying about?"

"It is not true," she answered, her lips quivering with pain.

Mr Quest laughed gently. "I think you must have lost your power of observation, which used to be sufficiently keen. However, of course it does not matter to you. It will in many ways be a most suitable marriage, and I am sure they will make a very handsome couple."

She made no answer, and turned her back to hide the workings of her face. For a few moments her husband stood looking at her, with a gentle smile playing on his refined features. Then remarking that he must go round to the office, but would be back in time for tea, he went, reflecting with satisfaction that he had given his wife something to think about which would be scarcely to her taste.

As for Belle Quest, she waited till the door had closed, and then turned round toward it and spoke aloud, as though she were addressing her vanished husband.

"I hate you," she said, with bitter emphasis, "I hate you. You have ruined my life, and now you torment me as though I were a lost soul. Oh, I wish I were dead! I wish I were dead!"

On reaching his office, Mr. Quest found two letters for him, one of which had just arrived by the afternoon post. The first was addressed in the squire's handwriting and sigaed with his big seal, and the other bore a superscription, the sight of which made him turn momentarily faint. Taking up this last with a visible effort, he opened it. It ran as follows:

"DEAR BILL—No answer this morning. I hope you ain't up to any of your tricks about the tin, because I won't stand it, that's all. I told you that I had dropped all my oof, not that I had much out of you this year, only five hundred and a beggarly £20 on my birthday and what I make at the Birmingham—four pound ten a week, and hard work for that. I'm cleaned out, and that's all about it. Only just now a brute of a fellow came in with a summons for rates, and I told him that my friend—that means you, Bill dear—was going to come down handsome in a day or two. He would not believe it—just as though he knew what a mean lot you were—so I told him to bundle out double quick, or I'd have the coal shoot at his head—and he went, you bet, but he'll be back before long with the summons. I say the coal shoot, for there ain't no coals in it, and I can't afford any money to get a bit of fire to warm my bones with. Then there's the landlord says he'll distrain for the rent, unless it's paid up in double quick time. And so the long and short of it is that, if I don't get about five hundred quid out of you in the course of next week, I'll know the reason why. And I'll just be plain with you, Bill, my old boy. If I don't see the color of that money by this day week, why, I will tell you what I am going to do. I am going to take a little country air—my complexion wants it—and I think Boisingham would suit first rate. In fact, I shall come down and pay you a visit, old boy; so perhaps you'll ask the lovely Mrs. Quest to get a room ready for me, and when I get down there, if I don't tell all the old respectables a thing or two about their beloved lawyer, and generally make them sit up and see stars, why, I ain't I. And now there's the straight tip from your affectionate 'Tiger.' But remember she'd always rather purr than growl. It's only when the cash don't come down that her back goes up. All a question of money, my boy, like everything else in this wicked world. Your beloved EDITH."

By the time that Mr. Quest had finished reading this precious effusion, the cold sweat was standing in beads on his forehead.

"Great heavens!" he said, "this woman will destroy me. What a devil! And she'd be as good as her word unless I found her the money. I must go up to town at once. I wonder how she got that idea into her head. It makes me shudder to think of such a thing," and he dropped his face upon his hands and groaned in the bitterness of his heart.

"It is hard," he thought to himself; "here I have for years and years been striving and toiling and laboring to become a respectable and respected member of society, and always this old folly haunts my steps and drags me down, and, by heaven, I believe that it will destroy me after all." With a sigh he lifted his head, and taking a sheet of paper wrote on it, "I have received your letter and will come and see you to-morrow or the next day." This letter he placed in an envelope,

"Great heavens!" he said, "this woman will destroy me."

which he directed to the high sounding name of Mrs. d'Aubigne, Stanley street, Pimlico, and put it in his pocket.

Then with another sigh he took up the squire's letter and glanced through it. Its length was considerable, but in substance it announced his acceptance of the arrangement proposed by Mr. Edward Cossey, and requested that he would prepare the necessary deeds to be submitted to his lawyers. Mr. Quest read the letter absently enough, and threw it down with a little laugh.

"What a queer world it is," he said to himself, "and what a ludicrous side it has to it all. Here is Cossey advancing money to get a hold over Ida de la Molle, whom he means to marry if he can, and who is probably playing her own game. Here is Belle madly in love with Cossey, who will break her heart. Here am I in love with Belle, who hates me, and playing everybody's game in order to advance my own, and become a venerated member of a society I am superior to. Here is the squire blundering about like a walrus in a horse pond, and fancying everything is being conducted for his sole advantage, and that all the world revolves round Honham castle. And then here at the end of the chain is this female harpy, Edith Jones, otherwise D'Aubigne, alias the Tiger, gnawing at my vitals and holding my fortunes in her hands. Bah! it is a queer world, and full of combinations; but the worst of it is that, plot as we will, the solution of them does not rest with us, no—not with us."

CHAPTER XV.

THE HOUSE WITH THE RED PILLARS.

Two days after his receipt of the second letter from the Tiger, Mr. Quest announced to his wife that he was going to London on business connected with the bank, and expected to be away for a couple of nights.

She laughed straight out. "Really, William," she said, "you are a most consummate actor. I wonder that you think it worth while to keep up the farce with me. Well, I hope that Edith is not going to be very expensive this time, because we don't seem to be too rich just now, and you see there is no more of my money for her to have."

Mr. Quest winced visibly beneath this bitter satire, which his wife uttered with a smile of infantile innocence playing upon her face, but he made no reply. She knew too much. Only in his heart he wondered what fate she would mete out to him if ever she got possession of the whole truth, and the thought made him tremble. It seemed to him that the owner of that baby face could be terribly merciless in her vengeance, and that those soft white hands would close round the throat of a man she hated, and utterly destroy him. Now, if never before, he realized that between him and this woman there must be enmity and a struggle to the death; and yet, strangely enough, he still loved her!

Mr. Quest reached London about 3 o'clock, and his first act was to drive to Cossey & Son's, where he was informed that old Mr. Cossey was much better, and having heard that he was coming to town had sent to say that he particularly wished to see him, especially about the Honham castle estates. Accordingly Mr. Quest drove on to the old gentleman's mansion in Grosvenor street, where he asked for Mr. Edward Cossey. The footman said that Mr. Edward was upstairs, and showed him into a study while he went to tell him of the arrival of his visitor. Mr. Quest glanced round the luxuriantly furnished room, which he saw was occupied by Edward himself, for some letters directed in his handwriting lay upon the desk, and a velveteen lounging coat that Mr. Quest recognized as belonging to him was hanging over the back of a chair. Mr. Quest's eye, wandering over this coat, was presently caught by the corner of a torn flap of an envelope which projected from one of the pockets. It was of a peculiar bluish tinge, in fact of a hue which was much affected by his wife. Listening for a moment to hear if anybody was coming, he stepped to the coat and extracted the letter. It was in his wife's handwriting, so he took the liberty of hastily transferring it to his own pocket. In another minute Edward Cossey entered, and the two men shook hands.

"How do you do, Quest?" said Edward. "I think that the old man is going to pull through this bout. He is helpless, but keen as a knife, and has all the important matters from the bank referred to him. I believe that he will last a year yet, but he will scarcely allow me out of his sight. He preaches away about business the whole day long, and says that he wants to communicate the fruits of his experience to me before it is too late. He wishes to see you; so if you will, you had better come up."

Accordingly they went up stairs to a large and luxurious bedroom on the first floor, where the stricken man lay upon a patent couch.

When Mr. Quest and Edward Cossey entered, a lady—old Mr. Cossey's eldest daughter—put down a paper out of which she had been reading the money article aloud, and, rising, informed her father that Mr. Quest had come.

"Mr. Quest?" said the old man, in a thin voice. "Ah, yes; I want to see Mr. Quest very much. Go away now, Anna; you can come back by and by. Business before pleasure. Most instructive, though, that sudden fall in American railways. But I thought it would come, and I got Cossey & Son clear of them," and he sniffed with satisfaction and looked as though he would have rubbed his hands if he had not been physically incapacitated from so doing.

Mr. Quest came forward to where the invalid lay. He was a gaunt old man with white hair and a pallid face, which looked almost ghastly in contrast to his black velvet skull cap. So far as Mr. Quest could see, he appeared to be almost totally paralyzed, with the exception of his head, neck and left arm, which he could still move a little. His black eyes, however, were full of life and intelligence, and roamed about the room without ceasing.

"How do you do, Mr. Quest?" he said; "sorry that I can't shake hands with you; but you see I have been stricken down, though my brain is clear enough—clearer than ever it was, I think. And I ain't going to die yet—don't think that I am, because I ain't. I may live two years more—the doctor says that I am sure to live one at least. A lot of money can be made in a year if you keep your eyes open. Once I made a hundred and twenty thousand for Cossey & Son in one year; and I may do it again before I die. I may make a lot of money, ah, a lot of money," and his voice went off into a kind of thin scream that was not pleasant to listen to.

"I am sure I hope you will, sir," said Mr. Quest, politely.

"Thank you; take that for good luck, you know. Well, well, Mr. Quest, things haven't done so bad down in your part of the world; not at all bad, considering the times. I thought that we should have to sell that old De la Molle up, but I hear that he is going to pay us off. Can't imagine who has been fool enough to lend him the money. A client of yours, eh? Well, he'll lose it, I expect, and serve him right for his pains. But I am not sorry, for it is unpleasant for a house like ours to have to sell an old client up. Not that his account is worth much—nothing at all; more trouble than profit—or we should not have done it. He's no better than a bankrupt, and the insolvency court is the best place for him. The world is to the rich and the fullness thereof. There's an insolvency court specially provided for De la Molle and his like—empty old windbags with long sounding names; let him go there and make room for the men who have made money—hee! hee! hee!" and once more his voice went off into a sort of scream.

Here Mr. Quest, who had had about enough of this sort of thing, changed the conversation by commencing to comment on various business transactions which he had been conducting on behalf of the house. The old man listened with the greatest interest, his keen black eyes attentively fixed upon the speaker's face, till at last Mr. Quest happened to mention that among others a certain Col. Quaritch had opened an account with their branch of the bank.

"Quaritch?" said the old man, eagerly, "I know that name. Was he ever in the One Hundred and Fifth Foot?"

"Yes," said Mr. Quest, who knew everything about everybody, "he was an ensign in that regiment during the Indian mutiny, where he was badly wounded when still quite young, and got the Victoria cross. I found it all out the other day."

He was a gaunt old man with white hair.

"That's the man; that's the man," said old Mr. Cossey, jerking his head in an excited manner. "He's a blackguard; I tell you he's a blackguard; he jilted my wife's sister. She was twenty years younger than my wife—jilted her a week before her marriage, and would never give a reason, and she went mad, and is in a madhouse now. I should like to have the ruining of him for it. I should like to drive him into the poorhouse."

Mr. Quest and Edward looked at each other, and the old man let his head fall back exhausted.

"Now, 'good-by,' Mr. Quest; they'll give you a bit of dinner down stairs," he said at length. "I'm getting tired, and I want to hear the rest of that money article. You've done very well for Cossey & Son, and Cossey & Son will do well for you, for we always pay by results; that's the way to get good work and make a lot of money. Mind, Edward, if ever you get a chance don't forget to pay that blackguard Quaritch out, pound for pound, and twice as much again for compound interest—hee! hee! hee!"

"The old gentleman keeps his head for business pretty well," said Mr. Quest to Edward Cossey as soon as they were well outside the door.

"Keeps his head?" answered Edward. "I should just think he did. He's a regular shark now, that's what he is. I really believe that if he knew I had found the thirty thousand for old De la Molle he would cut me off with a shilling." Here Mr. Quest pricked up his ears. "And he's close, too," he went on, "so close that it is almost impossible to get anything out of him. I am not particular, but upon my word, I think that it is rather disgusting to see an old man with one foot in the grave hanging on to his money bags, as though he expected to float to heaven on them."

"Yes," said Mr. Quest, "it is a curious thing to think of; but, you see, the money is his heaven."

"By the way," said Edward as they entered the study, "that's queer about that fellow Quaritch, isn't it? I never liked the look of him, with his pious air."

Very queer, Mr. Cossey," said he; "but do you know, I almost think that there must be some mistake. I do not believe that Col. Quaritch is the man to do things of that sort without a very good reason. However, nobody can tell, and it is a long while ago."

"A long while ago or not, I mean to let him know my opinion of him when I get back to Boisingham," said Edward, viciously. By Jove! it's twenty minutes past 6, and in this establishment we dine at the pleasant hour of half past. Won't you come and wash your hands?"

Mr. Quest got a very good dinner, and, contrary to his custom, he drank the best part of a bottle of old port after it. He had an unpleasant business to face that evening, and felt as though his nerves required bracing. About 10 o'clock he took his leave, and getting into a hansom bade the cabman drive to Stanley street, Pimlico, where he arrived in due course. Having dismissed his cab, he walked slowly down the street till he reached a small house with red pillars to the doorway. Here he rang the bell. The door was opened by a middle aged woman with a cunning face and a simper. Mr. Quest knew her well. Nominally the Tiger's servant, she was really her jackal, and in return for the intelligence she lent to the chase, received her portion of the prey.

"Is Mrs. d'Aubigne at home, Ellen?" he said.

"No, sir," she answered, with a simper, "but she will be back from the music hall before long. She does not appear in the second part. But please come in, sir. You are quite a stranger here, and I am sure that Mrs. d'Aubigne will be very glad to see you, for she have been dreadfully pressed for money of late, poor dear. Nobody knows the trouble that I have had with those sharks of tradesmen."

By this time they were up stairs in the drawing room, and Ellen had turned the gas up. The room was well furnished in a certain gaudy style, which included a good deal of gilt and plate glass. Evidently, however, it had not been tidied since the Tiger had left it, for there on the table were cards thrown this way and that, amid an array of empty soda water bottles, glasses with dregs of brandy in them, and other debris, such as the ends of cigars and cigarettes, and a little copper and silver money. On the sofa, too, lay a gorgeous tea gown resplendent with pink satin, also a pair of gold embroidered slippers, not over small, and an odd gant de Suede, with such an extraordinary number of buttons that it almost looked like the cast off skin of a brown snake.

"I see that your mistress has been having company, Ellen," he said, coldly.

"Yes, sir, just a few lady friends in to cheer her up a bit," answered the woman, with her abominable simper. "Poor dear, she do get that low with you away so much, and no wonder; and then all these money troubles, and she night by night working hard for her living. Often and often have I seen her crying over it all"——

"Ah," said he, breaking in upon her eloquence, "I suppose that the lady friends smoke cigars. Well, clear away this mess and leave me. Stop, give me a brandy and soda first. I will wait for your mistress."

The woman stopped talking and did as she was bid, for there was a look in Mr. Quest's eye which she did not quite like. So, having placed the brandy and soda water before him, she left him to his own reflections.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

It is not often that a reigning Queen finds herself without a single change of dress. This was, however, the fate of her Majesty of Belgium, on the 1st inst. Her entire wardrobe had been destroyed in the conflagration of the Royal Palace at Laeken, and owing to the fact of the day being a public holiday, every store in Brussels was closed.

The Secretary of the Navy has issued a circular prescribing that the funeral expenses of enlisted men and appointed petty officers who die and are buried out of the United States must not exceed $50 each, unless due regard for decent burial renders greater expense necessary.

READ A FEW LINES OF GOOD ADVICE —IT MAY SAVE YOUR LIFE.

I am broken down and discouraged, and don't know just what to do for my health. This remark we often hear from both men and women that are positively in that condition that life is no longer to them a pleasure but instead a continual bore. THE GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE is especially adapted for just such cases. It acts gently on the bowels, purifies the blood without unsightly blotches, renovates the kidneys and liver, the great organs of existence that must be kept clear. By thus doing its work it brings the nervous system into a healthy condition, producing sound and refreshing sleep. For all female complaints, leucorrhea, suppressed menses, no matter from what cause, attended by severe pain, and all other complaints so common among women, it immediately relieves and effects a permanent cure. Put aside all prejudice and give this most wonderful and best of all remedies a trial. Warranted purely vegetable. Delightful to the taste. For sale by all druggists. Take no other.

POOR HUMANITY!

The common lot is one of sorrow say—at least—the pessimists, they who look at the worst side. Certainly what would otherwise be a bright existence, is often shadowed by some ailment that overhangs it like a pall, obscuring perpetually the radiance that else would light the path. Such an ailment, and a very common one, is nervousness, or in other words, weakness of the nervous system, a condition only irremediable where inefficient or improper means are taken to relieve it. The concurrent experience of nervous people who have persistently used Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is, that it conquers entirely supersensitiveness of the nerves, as well as diseases—so called—which are invited and sustained by their chronic weakness. As the nerves gain stamina from the great tonic the trouble disappears. Use the Bitters for malaria, rheumatism, billiousness and kidney troubles.

A WOMAN IN THE CASE.

There always is. She is the power behind the throne. A woman's influence over the man who loves her is often absolute. To wield so great a power to guide, strengthen and help her husband, a woman's mind should be clear and healthy. It cannot be if she is suffering from any functional derangement. How many a home is made unhappy because she who should be its life and light is a wretched, depressed, morbid invalid! Wives, mothers and daughters, why suffer from "female complaints" which are sapping your lives away, when Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will renew your health and gladden those about you? It has restored happiness to many a saddened life. Why endure martyrdom when release is so easy? In its special field there never was a restorative like the "Favorite Prescription."

To cleanse the stomach, liver, and system generally, use Dr. Pierce's Pellets. 25 cents.

HOW A $1 INVESTMENT IN THE LOUISIANA STATE LOTTERY.

Increased Fifteen Thousand Fold—A Very Lucky Countryman.

The Express but recently published the fact that Mr. Z. P. Cole, a poor man who resides at Pearsall, was the lucky winner of fifteen thousand dollars in The Louisiana State Lottery, having purchased ticket No. 98,455, which drew one-fortieth of the grand capital prize of $600,000 in the December drawing. Mr. Cole is a remarkably lucky man, for he seems to have known just where and when to invest a dollar where it would do the most good. After learning of his good fortune, Mr. Cole sent his ticket to New Orleans by express, where it was cashed in full by the bank and the money returned to him in a remarkably short time, thus demonstrating the fact that The Louisiana State Lottery Company is as reliable as ever, and never makes a promise but what is carried out to the letter.

Mr. Cole, as stated above, was a poor man, having been working for the small sum of $15 per month. His good fortune however, has not turned his head, and he proposes to use his means in the effort to better his condition for the remainder of his life.—San Antonio (Tex.) Express January 8.

Doctors disagree as to the relative value of Cod Liver Oil and Hypophosphites; the one supplying strength and flesh, the other giving nerve power, and acting as a tonic to the digestive and entire system. But in Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil with Hypophosphites the two are combined, and the effect is wonderful. Thousands who have derived no permanent benefit from other preparations have been cured by this. TALK IS CHEAP, but it will only take a minute in which to state a few facts, that, if heeded, will prove invaluable to many. It's well-known that the press teems with advertisements of sarsaparillas and other liver, blood and lung remedies, for which great claims are made. They are generally represented as sure cures. But there is one medicine, and only one, the claims for which as a cure for all lingering diseases arising from Torpid Liver or Biliousness, or from impure blood, are backed up by a positive guarantee! If it don't do just as represented in every case, the money paid for it is promptly refunded.

This peculiar method of business, it will readily be seen, would bankrupt the manufacturers of the ordinary medicines in the market. Only a marvelously efficacious medicine, containing the most positive curative properties, could sustain itself under such trying conditions as these.

This peculiar medicine sells beyond all others throughout the civilized world. And why should it not? "Talk is cheap," but when it's backed up by a positive guarantee, by a house of long established reputation, for honesty, integrity and sound financial standing, then words mean business! And that's just what the World's Dispensary Medical Association, of Buffalo, N. Y., mean in guaranteeing their Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery to do all that it is recommended to do, or refund the price paid for it.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery checks the frightful inroads of Scrofula, and, if taken in time, arrests the march of Consumption of the Lungs, which is Lung-scrofula, purifies and enriches the blood, thereby curing all Skin and Scalp Diseases, Ulcers, Sores, Swellings, and kindred ailments. It is powerfully tonic as well as alterative, or blood-cleansing, in its effects, hence it strengthens the system and restores vitality, thereby dispelling all those "tired feelings" experienced by the debilitated. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands.

CATARRH IN THE HEAD, no matter of how long standing, is permanently cured by DR. SAGE'S CATARRH REMEDY. 50 cents, by druggists.

SPENDING OR SAVING.

A Question Which Seriously Affects the Happiness of Every Family.

There is no question that affects so largely a majority of the American people as the one of economy, which means wise spending and wise saving. The model housekeeper or housemother of to-day should be an object-lesson to de held up for study before the town in which she lives. The woman who is cultured, educated, refined and yet enjoys domestic life and knows how to care for the money brought into the home by the husband and how to use it wisely and well for the comfort of her family is as much of a missionary as though she were teaching the Hottentots civilization.

The cost of living is becoming a serious affair with the majority of people, and is often double what it ought to be with but half the comfort. We have sometimes thought that the subject of domestic economy ought to be taught in the higher grades of our city schools and in all the country schools of our land. If we had that teaching in our own hands, we would commence with making an effort to eradicate the almost universal feeling of shame which seems to be felt in every mind when using the word "economy." If it could be made a public sentiment that it were disgraceful not to use, as well as practice it, half the battle would be fought.

As it is, every one wants what they see others have, and families with small incomes of five hundred dollars feel defrauded of their rights if they can't live in the same style as the family with twice the resources. The husband and father works at his trade, or on a salary, from ten to fourteen hours a day, bringing in the money, the wife and daughters and sons work as many hours each day getting rid of what the head of the house brings in, and to what purpose? To make as much of a display as some other family that is trying to copy some one else, and so on and on. Mrs. A has a new silk. Immediately Mrs. B, Mrs. C and Mrs. D must have one. Mrs. B has a new carpet for her parlor. Instantly Mrs. A, Mrs. C and Mrs. D feel the need of a new carpet as never before. Miss A has a new piano. The keys rattle and the piano is "dreadfully out of tune" in the homes of Miss B, Miss C and Miss D. Jack A has a pony or a new dog-cart, and there is no end to the teasing until John B, Dick C and Ned D all have ponies or dog-carts. And this goes on clear down to the unseen matters of daily life, and every one is just as full of unrest and dissatisfaction as they were before the purchase of the coveted goods.

Let one woman with intelligence, grace and superior advantages go into a community filled with A's, B's, C's and D's, and live on a higher plane, caring never to cops her neighbors, and these people get an idea they never before enjoyed. Let this woman talk economy, practice it and feel really glad and proud she can, and how the taste of that whole neighborhood will change! I know three wealthy women in a city who years ago promised each other to dress for five years on fifty dollars a year. The good influence that resulted from that act has never died out. I know wealthy women who talk economy and practice it simply for the sake of others. God bless such women! A woman who has fifty dollars a month to spend and gives away the lion's share, spending very little for selfish purpose, is a woman whose life does not end at death. What we wear and what we eat need be but a small part of our living, and yet we are making it by far the larger part.—Cor. Atlanta Constitution.

Study and Health.

Mlle. Lucie Hall, doctor at Vassar College, on going into the question of hygienic influence of hard study on women, with regard to the remarkable diminution of large families in America, has come to the following conclusions, which deserve to be examined: One hundred and seventy-six families proved on examination to have only an average of from three to two children. Now, out of those families those who had the largest number of children were found to have highly-educated mothers, not to say educated above the average. Dr. Hall's experience has proved to her that the health of the young people is particularly good, and even improves as the studies increase. She cites the following words of M. Bascom, Director of the Wisconsin University: "The health of our young people in no wise diminishes whilst with us; on the contrary, I have long since noticed that a young lady who gives up society and takes up reasonably with study at the university is in far better condition, as far as health is concerned, than the majority of her sex.—Chicago Tribune.

The circumference of its head in 1882 was fifteen hundred and eighty-seven feet. SHEEP HUSBANDRY.

The Necessity of Improving Existing Methods of Sheep Raising.

Sheep husbandry has been conducted on methods adapted to the conditions of a pioneer country. We think our pioneer methods are of the past. So they are in very many things, perhaps; so they ought to be in very many that they are not. American agriculture, we think, has advanced rapidly toward higher systems. I can name a man, who is esteemed foremost as an agriculturist and stock-breeder and feeder in Illinois, who hauls out his barn-yard manure and piles it on out-of-the-way places to get rid of it. His land needs no fertilizers, he says. There are thus disposed of hundreds of loads of manure. Is that indicative of pioneer or advanced farming?

These are instances to show the difference between claims and facts. Our American sheep husbandry is to-day behind the times. We have been plodding in the same old ways of breeding, feeding and handling sheep as our fathers did. We are away down deep in the ruts. We have fossilized in consequence. We breed just as our fathers did fifty years ago. We feed the same as they fed. The sheep must live in what we call the pasture one half of the year, at least, with what grass, weeds, briars and brush may be found there, which, with our variable season, may be an uncertain quantity. If there are too many sheep for the feed, the excuse for the flock doing badly is one to be overlooked—overstocked. If the winter's supply is a little short for the welfare of the flock, the situation is met with the same cold comfort as the summer situation. Such conditions for a flock will certainly be felt and seen in the flesh and fleece of the sheep. There can be no money in such a flock. Such flocks usually are neglected; neglect will always produce such flocks. Then come various ills—scab, foot-rot, grub in the head, internal parasites of the various and most malignant sorts. The sheep are poor, out of health. They have catarrh, ticks and lice. The fleeces are starved—dry, brittle, often with a joint in the fibers and unmerchantable. And sheep do not pay! The dogs come in for their share of the spoils. The owner is disgusted. He wants a remedy against what? These miserable conditions or the National Government?

These conditions were not without a remedy. The sheep needed more protection from starvation, diseases, parasites, exposure and dogs; but the owners abuse any body who proposes such home protection as intimated here. That is all right, but we need to commence at the bottom and do our best first, and then we shall know where the remedy must come from. It is not unsafe nor untimely to insist upon the better protection of our flocks at home; then look to their safety from local and afterward State authorities. If these shall fail us after doing our best, we shall know and not be disappointed in the needed help. We must study the wools of the world's markets—where they come from, what they are like, what they are worth and what it costs to produce them.

The sheep of the future has to be one in which meat shall have a prominence in connection with wool. To-day we are giving much prominence to matters in which the profits can not be determined by the scales. In the future the number of pounds of meat and clean wool will be the basis of profits, or your correspondent fails to read the handwriting on the wall.—Cor. Farm and Fireside.

DUEL BETWEEN PLANTS.

The War Waged by a Sumach and a Climbing Bitter-Sweet.

Some time ago my pupils were much interested in finding what they inappropriately termed a hand-to-hand conflict between a sumach (Rhus typhina) and a climbing bitter-sweet (Celastrus scandens). Judging from the appearance when found, the sumach was about two inches in diameter when the bitter sweet first wound its coils about it. As the growth of each proceeded, these coils became tighter and tighter, cutting into and through the bark and growing layer of the sumach which seemed to be threatened with strangulation. It was not, however, to be so easily vanquished. It resolutely kept up its manufacture of new material, which, owing to the tight embrace of the vine, had to be distributed along a spiral line immediately above the coils. Just below the coils the supply appeared to be cut off, as the trunk was then shriveled and in most places dead. Although rendered unsightly, the tree presented the curious feature of having two spirals, one of living, growing, the other dead and decaying material wound about its heart wood, so that the whole resembled a huge auger. To avenge this deformity the sumach proceeded to push its new growth out above and over the coils of the vine until at one place it had completely encompassed it. The vine, in turn, was now so tightly squeezed as to be cut off from communication with the ground, and below this point but little life remained. Victory now seemed within the grasp of the sumach. The vine, however, in its last extremity now united itself with the growing layer of the sumach, and thus literally drew from the cause of the enemy whatever supplies were needed to keep its top bright and thrifty. At this stage the conflict was cut short by the age of the collector, and the combatants, locked in each other's arms, were laid away among the curiosities of a museum.—Journal of Education.

MUTUAL ASSURANCE.

Meeting of an Insurance Agent and a Corn-Salve Peddler.

The other day a well-dressed stranger, carrying a hand-valise, called at a life insurance agent's and inquired if the agent was in.

The agent came forward, rubbing his hands, and the stranger asked:

"Do you take life-insurance risks here?"

"Yes, sir; glad to see you, sir. Sit down sir," replied the agent.

"What do you think of life insurance, anyway?" inquired the stranger, as he sat down and took off his hat.

"It's a national blessing—an institution which is looked upon with a sovereign favor by every enlightened man and woman in the country."

"That's what I always thought," answered the man. "Does your company pay its losses promptly?"

"Yes, sir—yes, sir. If you were insured with me, and you should die to-night, I'd hand your wife a check within a week."

"Couldn't ask for any thing better than that."

"No, sir; no, sir. The motto of our company is 'Prompt pay and honorable dealings.'"

"How much will a policy for one thousand cost?" inquired the stranger, after a long pause.

"You are, let's see—say thirty-five, and in good health—a policy on you would cost about twenty-five a year."

"That's reasonable enough."

"Yes, that's what we call low. But ours is a strong company, does a safe business, and invests only in first-class securities; if you are thinking of taking out a policy, let me tell you that ours is the best and safest, and even the agents of rival companies will admit the truth of that."

"And when I die my wife will get her money without any trouble?"

"I'll guarantee that, my dear sir."

"And I'll get a dividend every year?"

"Yes, this is a mutual company, and part of the company's profits come back to the policy holders."

"And it won't cost me but twenty-five dollars for a policy of one thousand dollars?"

"That's the figure, and it is as low as you can get safe insurance any where. Let me fill you up a proposal. You'll never regret it."

"Them's the blanks, I suppose?" said the stranger, pointing to the forms.

"Yes, sir," replied the agent, as he drew one to him, and took up a pen. "What do you say, shall I fill one up?"

"No, I won't take any to-day," replied the stranger, as he unlocked his valise. "But if you want something that will take that wart off your nose inside of a week, I have got it here. It's good for corns, bunions, the toothache, ear-ache, sprains ——"

"Clear out of here," screamed the duped agent, with a heightened color, "or there will be a chance for the coroners in this neighborhood immediately, if not sooner."

He cleared out.—London Tidbits.

He Had Excellent Reasons.

Among the vehicles on the market the other morning was a one-horse wagon in which was a barrel of cider. A citizen who was evidently spying around for something of the sort approached the owner of the cider and asked:

"Is your cider now?"

"Of course."

"Make it out of apples?"

"Certainly I did."

"Reduced it with water?"

"No, sir."

"Are those straws around the bung real wheat straws from the farm, or only artificial?"

"What do you take me for!" indignantly exclaimed the farmer.

"Keep-cool, my friend. Were the apples windfalls or regular cider apples?"

"You go on! I don't believe you ever saw cider made!"

"Ah! my boy, there's the pinch! I used to make two hundred barrels a year in a cellar up the street, and the only use we made of apples was to keep a peck in the window up-stairs for a blind! I'm buying now, and that's why I am so particular."—Detroit Free Press.

Advantages of Early Marriage.

You don't run the risk of dying an old maid.

It is better to be a young fool than an old one.

The unmarried girl feels she is growing old too quick.

If you make a bad match you can blame it to inexperience.

When you are getting old no one will take you but a widower.

It prevents your married friends from sympathising with you.

If you wait till you are thirty it is hard to get a young husband.

The man who marries on old woman also wants something thrown in.

You are apt to get shop-worn if you remain long on the matrimonial market.

You have a better chance to catch a second husband if you happen to lose your first.

If you catch a millionaire's son you will have him before he has blown in his fortune.

You avoid the pleasure of having all your girl friends tell you how happy they are with their husbands.—Judge.

ANIMAL FRIENDSHIPS.

Disinterested Devotion Displayed by Elephants and Other Creatures.

That the lower animals have their special friends, or show preferences as to their companions, no observer can doubt. In some cases, the friendship is between two of the same tribe; again, we find what are generally considered the most antagonistic forms united in bonds of good-fellowship, and we see acts of devotion and self-sacrifice that are almost identical with those that characterize the friendship of human beings. It is needless to say that the impulses are much the same in all; some professing an interest that is actuated entirely by greed, or for personal ends; while in others it is unselfish.

Any one who has visited the herd of elephants owned by Mr. Barnum must have noticed the large dog that stood by the side of one of the huge pachyderms. To the visitor this might have seemed accidental; but the dog was always at its post by this particular animal. If the dog wandered off, the elephant showed its distress immediately by attempting to follow; straining at the chain confined to its ponderous feet, or throwing aloft its trunk and uttering the shrill whistle indicative of alarm, and only resuming the monotonous swing of the head when its companion returned. The elephant was often observed caressing the dog, and, though the latter always slept in the straw, sometimes beneath its huge friend, it was never stepped upon nor crushed. When the elephant was led out to go through its task in the ring, the dog would begin to bark and endeavor to join the throng of performers; so that it was perfectly evident that the friendship was mutual.

In many of the works of old writers are found instances of such attachments between man and beast: Ælian records a friendship between a little girl, who sold flowers in the streets of Antioch, and an elephant whom she was in the habit of feeding. One of the elephants in the Barnum herd exhibited great interest in a little daughter of one of the attendants, holding her upon its trunk, and in many ways showing its affection.

In India the elephants are so trusted that they are sometimes employed as nurses, and have been seen tending their charges, lifting them gently back when they were disposed to stray away. The natives state that these great animals have been known to die of a broken heart when deprived of a certain keeper, and Lieutenant Shipp, an English officer of extensive experience in the East, gives a minute account of an elephant that died in what was considered a fit of remorse after having killed its keeper.

While attachment between animals is everywhere to be seen, it is not often that we witness such acts of disinterested devotion as we expect among human beings. Mother-birds protect their young in the face of every danger; but it must be confessed that few observers have seen animals go to the rescue of others without maternal or paternal incentive; but such cases are not wanting.

Some years ago a Scotch naturalist wishing to obtain a gull fired at a flock, breaking the wing of one which came fluttering down, falling into the ocean. At first the flock were demoralized, and flew wildly about, uttering harsh cries, but a moment later they seemed to be recalled to a sense of duty by the struggles of their wounded comrade, and two birds darted down, seized it by the tips of its wings, then rose and bore it away in triumph; for, as may be supposed, the naturalist did not fire, but permitted the rescue. Here was friendship indeed; heroism, in fact, as the other birds alarmed by the fire faced the same danger.—Wide Awake.

An Old Miser's Wealth.

J. O. Maloney, an old recluse, living near Morris, Conn., died recently, and a close search was ineffectual in disclosing the whereabouts of a large sum of money he was known to possess. A few days ago two men wounded a gray squirrel near Maloney's house, and it crawled into an old box that was placed between two branches of a tree. One of the men with considerable difficulty reached the box. When it was opened, he found the squirrel stretched out dead on a pile of chewed-up bank notes. Not a bill had been left intact by the squirrels, and it was impossible to tell the denomination of a single one. Persons who have examined the mutilated bills are of the opinion that there could not have been less than $5,000 in the box.—N. Y. Post.

SCHOOL AND CHURCH.

—There are in the Church of England one hundred clergymen, converts from Judaism, and over three thousand communicants.

—Do little helpful things and speak helpful words whenever you can. They are better than pearls or diamonds to strew along the roadside of life.

—Colonel William C. Morrill, secretary and treasurer of the Western & Atlantic railroad, formerly of Maine, left $25,000 for Atlanta University and $20,000 for the Y. M. C. A. of the same city.

—Levi Prosser, of Hartford, Conn., has presented the City Mission of that city with a 208-acre farm, to be used as an industrial school for homeless children. The monetary value of the gift is a little short of $65,000.

—Statistics show that there are at present 870,000 adult converts from the heathen world in full communion with various Protestant churches as the result of missionary labor. These, with their families and dependents in Christian communities, aggregate at least 2,800,000 souls.—Public Opinion.

—Princeton College has decided to break up hazing. Already a number of students who have interfered with freshmen have been sent home. Hazing is a relic of barbarism that should not be tolerated a single day, and it only thrives in colleges where discipline is lax.—Central Christian Advocate.

—It was in 1810 that the American Board, the first foreign missionary society in this country, was formed; since then it has received from the church for its world-wide mission work over $18,000,000. During this period the contributions to all the foreign mission societies of the country have amounted to over $57,000,000.

—Writing from Cape Palmas, Liberia, Bishop William Taylor says: "The king and chiefs bind themselves by written agreement to give us all the land we need for our mission and industrial school purposes, to clear land and first crop, to build good kitchen and school-house, and all free of charge. We hope (D. V.) to build seventeen houses between this and Christmas, and to occupy them by thirty new missionary men and women by January, 1888."

—If I am asked what is the remedy for the deeper sorrows of the human heart—what a man should chiefly look to in his progress through life, as the power that is to sustain him under trials and enable him manfully to confront his afflictions, I must point him to something which, in a well-known hymn, is called "the old, old story," told of in an old, old book, and taught with an old, old teaching, which is the greatest and best gift ever given to mankind.—Gladstone.

—The piety that Christ smiles upon is piety that will stand a pinch and face a storm; that would rather eat an honest crust than face sumptuously on unholy gains; that gladly gives up its couch of ease to sally off on its mission among the outcasts; that sets its Puritan face like a flint against fashionable sins. We talk glibly about "taking up a cross" but a cross is intended for somebody's crucifixion. On Calvary's cross we know full well who bled away his precious life. On our cross self is to be the victim.—Dr. Cuyler.

SCULPTOR ST. GAUDENS.

Facts Concerning the Designer of the New Lincoln Statue in Chicago.

As the first step in the resuscitation of sculpture was the abandonment of the stilted imitation or third-rate Roman antiques, and the study of the works of the Italian Renaissance, it was a happy coincidence that Augustus St. Gaudens should have had much such an apprenticeship as a Florentine sculptor of the fifteenth century might have had. St. Gaudens' father was of Southern France; his mother was Irish. He himself is a New-Yorker, well-nigh from birth—having been brought to this city from Dublin, his birth-place, while yet an infant. He was early apprenticed to a New York cameo-cutter, and faithfully served his time, and even during the period of his study in Paris he devoted half of his working hours to bread-winning in the exercise of his trade. He attributes much of his success to the habit of faithful labor acquired at this time, and speaks of his apprenticeship as "one of the most fortunate things that ever happened to him." Perhaps one may attribute to it, also, part of that mystery of low-relief which is such a noticeable element in his artistic equipment. In 1868 he went to Paris to begin the serious study of his art, and after working for some time in the Petite Ecole, entered the studio of Jouffroy in the Ecole des Beaux Arts.

This was the year of the Universal Exposition, and in that exposition he saw the "Florentine Singer" of Paul Dubois, which had received the medal of honor two years before the Salon. This statue, in which the very spirit of Renaissance breathed again, must have marked an epoch for him, as it did for modern sculptors.

Many of the brilliant sculptors of to-day were educated in the studio of Jouffroy; Falguiere and St. Marceau had left it shortly before St. Gaudens entered it; Merci was his fellow-student there, and he thus became a part of the young and vigorous movement of contemporary sculpture. He afterwards went to Rome, and finally, returning to this country, was given in a happy hour the commission for the Farragut statue in Madison Square. From the time that statue was exhibited in the plaster, at the Salon of 1880, his talent was recognized and his position assured.—Century.

BUFFALO AND BULL-DOG.

Plucky Conduct of a Dog Which Went Hunting on the Plains.

The pack of dogs were in full cry after the stampeding herds of bellowing beasts as they rushed and tore along the column with their peculiar, rolling gait. But King, the bull-dog, singled out the immense wounded leader, who had now slackened his speed and was faltering in his tracks. He sprang at his throat with great courage, fastened upon him, and the battle commenced, with the columns as silent spectators. It was a novel spectacle. The brooded troopers, the great, shaggy beasts thundering by, the white-topped wagon train closed up and halted, the fleeting shadows, and the almost limitless stretch of surrounding prairie and vast solitude. The bull went down upon his knees, but so great was his strength that he quickly arose and whirled the dog in great circles over his head. King had been taught never to let go. The entire command now watched with breathless attention the apparently unequal struggle, expecting every moment to see the dog crushed to death. Down went the bull again on his knees, this time not from any weakness, but to gore the dog; rising, he would stamp his feet, in his rage, then shaking him awhile he would resume swinging and snapping him like whip-cord through the air. The foam, now bloody, flecked the long, tawny beard of the bison bull. His eyes, nearly concealed in the long matted hair that covered his shaggy head, flashed fire, and his rage knew no bounds. The dog, which had commenced the fight a pure white, now turned to a spotted crimson from blood which had flowed from the buffalo's wounds, and still his brute instincts, tenacious courage and training led him to hold on. Had he let go for a moment the crazed bull would have gored him to death before he could have retreated. The bull grew perceptibly weaker; he rose to his feet less often. He could no longer throw the dog in circles above his head. The blood stained King to a more vivid red, and, begrimed with dirt, he had lost all semblance to his former self. All were anxiously looking for the struggle to end. Impatience was already displayed upon the men's faces, when suddenly General MacKenzie shouted: "Kill the animal and put him out of his misery." It was a merciful command. Two men stepped forward to the enormous beast, now on his knees rocking to and fro, the dog still holding on, and placing their carbines behind the left shoulder, to reach a vital point, fired. He gave one great quiver, one last spasmodic rocking, and spread himself upon the vast prairie, dead. Not till then did King let go!—Outing.

TOLD BY THE TASTE.

How Tobacco Experts Make Their Choice of Different Brands.

"I'll smoke that and then tell you how I like it."

"Well, I'll not put the brand on the market on the strength of that test," returned one of the largest importers of cigars in the city to a friend whom he had asked to give his opinion of a new brand of cigars he thought of introducing to the public.

"All right. Just give me a box of them and I'll be able to make a better test of their worth."

"That would be no better than the first plan you suggested."

"Perhaps, then," repled the friend, slightly offended, "you don't consider me a capable judge of tobacco."

"Nothing of the sort. You certainly have had enough experience to tell a good cigar when you smoke it, but while that test may be sufficient for you to judge whether the cigar suits your individual taste or not, it is not thorough enough for my purposes."

"How should a cigar be judged, then, if not by smoking it?"

"There are several ways. First by its appearance. You can tell by looking at it whether it is well made or not. Then it's color has much to do with its value. But the way to test its flavor is by tasting and smelling it."

"How can you taste a cigar without smoking it? You wouldn't chew it, would you?"

"By no means. To taste a cigar you take the large end in your mouth and press your tongue against the ends of the leaves. Then draw your breath through it three or four times. That way you get the entire flavor. I have bought tobacco for thirty years, and I use my judgment almost solely in my purchases. During that time I have never smoked a single cigar, cigarette or pipe, and I never chewed in all my life. Smoking vitiates the delicate taste of a judge of tobacco. Yes, indeed, there are many things in our business that the public doesn't know, and that is one of them."—N. Y. Mail and Express.

County Official Paper.

No reasonable person objects to giving the Central Pacific Company seventy years to pay its debt to the Government, and that till paid the debt shall bear two percent. interest per annum. But it will be hard to convince farmers that their land is not as good security to the Government as a mortgage upon the Central Pacific railroad. And it will be still harder to convince them that it is just to compel them to pay four to six times as much interest as it is proposed to charge the railroad company and tax them heavily at the same time to support the Government and keep money idle in the National Treasury. The more that the proposition of Senator Stanford is discussed the more just and reasonable it appears to be.

Colusa county is one of the most fertile regions in the State, or in the world. It has no barren deserts, mountains, or irreclaimable swamps. It has a fine climate and is within easy reach of San Francisco. For these reasons it ought to be very thickly settled. The Colusa Sun says that in a part of the county containing one hundred and eighty square miles there is but one child. Most of the country is owned by a few people and these prefer to live in large cities. Great landed estates are a curse to any country. Sooner or later the massess of mankind must demand a share of that Earth which the Creator made for all and not for the exclusive ownership of a few.

Before Prince Hatzfeldt married the adopted daughter of C. P. Huntington he lived with a prostitute. Now the money of Mr. Huntington is demanded to pay for stockings, petticoats, ribbons, perfumery and other finery that Hatzfeld got on "tick" for the woman while he lived with her. A few really vulgar and foolish American young women have brought contempt upon themselves by marrying titled blackguards in Europe. The character of the women of America is no more affected by the conduct of these silly girls than the manhood of Americans was affected by the villiany of Benedict Arnold.

The Los Angeles Herald, a very ably conducted Democratic paper, intimates that many influential Democrats will try to secure the re-election of Senator Stanford when his present term in the Senate shall end. The Herald objects to this on party grounds alone. It is a most hopeful sign of the times when men who are influential in party politics can rise so high above party spirit as to endeavor to keep in the Senate the man who is best able to serve the State and Na-Nation.

Dieulafoy's Excavations at Susa.

One of the most important archæological expeditions undertaken in western Asia is that of M. and Mme. Diculafoy, who were sent by the French department of public instruction and of public works to Media and Persia to explore the remains of the ancient cities of those regions. Their first expedition was undertaken in 1881 and 1882, and their work was completed in the years 1884, 1885, 1886. The excavations, which were carried out with great difficulty, on account of the fanaticism of the inhabitants, have yielded valuable results from an archæological as well as from an historical standpoint. The palaces of Artaxerxes and of Darius have been excavated, and it is now possible to reconstruct the plans of these magnificent buildings. The objects collected during these excavations have been transported to Paris, and form one of the most interesting departments of the Louvre. The collections contain polychromic bas-reliefs from the royal palace, representing lion and warriors, and potteries of the First and Second century of our era. Besides architectural remains, numerous inscribed cylinders, ivory, bronze and clay objects have been found. The palace, a model of which is being made, was a magnificent building rising on a platform sixty feet in height, protected by wall, and accessible only on the south side by a large staircase.—Science.

A Substitute for Coffee.

The Paris correspondent of The Glasgow Mail writes of the discovery of an extraordinary nature made in the island of Reunion which threatens to make havoc in the coffee trade. It is said that a plant called the wild orange grows on the island. It produces a fruit which is green at first and afterward bluish, verging into purple as it ripens. Hitherto the product of the plant has not attracted any particular notice in a commercial sense, but it has recently been tested and found to possess qualities which will render it an admirable substitute for coffee, the use of which will place within the reach of those who hitherto have not been well able to afford the high prices which in many places are asked for good coffee a beverage which will be in every way the equal of the latter. The government of the colony is said to have the matter in hand, and about 24,000 acres in the highest portion of the island are now under cultivation for the growth of the "wild oranges."

MOTIVES OF KIDNAPERS.

WHY CHILDREN ARE SO OFTEN STOLEN FROM THEIR HOMES.

People Afflicted with a Mental Derangement Which Prompts Them to the Commission of the Crime—Celebrated Cases, Including That of Charley Ross.

Why are children stolen? Not many of them are kidnaped in the hope of pecuniary reward. Cases of this sort, such as the Charley Ross abduction, are rare. Revenge may be the motive in exceptional instances, but usually it turns out that the parents of the stolen child were utterly unknown to the abductors. That the incentive is a pure love for children and the desire to have a child is disproved by the fact that nine times in ten the stolen one is wofully abused and maltreated. Probably the most satisfactory explanation is that certain people are affected by a peculiar mental derangement which prompts them to the commission of the crime without malice aforethought. It is, in fact, child kleptomania, although this peculiar phase of mania has not been dignified with a scientific name of its own in the book.

NOT OFTEN FOR LOVE.

Even this theory falls short when we think of the numerous cases in which, without apparent motive, two or three persons unite to do the stealing. They cannot each be afflicted simultaneously to such an extent.

That a child stolen by a partially insane person should be inhumanly treated is no cause for wonder; it naturally follows that any one with so distorted a sense of right and wrong, necessarily without a moiety of love or feeling, would not be capable of tenderness or even consideration.

In 1815 a child named Lambert was stolen from her parents in Baltimore by a young woman, apparently sane, purely because she wanted it to keep. She was arrested a few days later, and the child was found mangled and bleeding, and almost dead. The evidence showed that the child had been maltreated "because it wouldn't walk fast enough."

Of course, there are many cases when the abduction is due to abnormal love and yearning, pure and simple. A well known judge the other day said: "Last summer I sent my family to England. My little girl, 4 years old, being too young to stand the trip, was placed in the care of a friend of mine, whose family consists of a wife and one child. When the folks came back in the autumn I went to get the child, but do you think he was willing to give her up? Not much. He said: 'I've had this child six months now, and I don't propose to part with her. You have a large family, and can just as well spare that little girl as not. Now, if you go to law about it and recover the child, as I suppose you can, I shall regard you as unworthy of respect and will never speak to you as long as I live.' This from a friend of years standing! He was in earnest, too. I ultimately got the child, but my friend and I are strangers yet."

NOT YET FORGOTTEN.

Any mention of child stealing always recalls the Charley Ross case. So celebrated was the affair that now, sixteen years after, it has not to a great degree faded out of the popular mind, though perhaps the details have.

Christian K. Ross lived in a handsome dwelling, isolated by a large yard, in Germantown, a Philadelphia suburb. One July afternoon all of the family happened to be absent save two young brothers, aged 4 and 8 years. They were playing together in the front street when two men drove up in a covered wagon. One of the men jumped out and addressed the little boys, offered them candy, and finally pursuaded them to take a ride. After driving a short distance the elder brother was given some money and sent on an errand for more candy. He returned in a few minutes, but the wagon had disappeared, and Charley Ross has not been seen to this day. The crime was committed to extort a ransom for the return of the child, but the abductors' fear of capture was so great that no agreement between them and the father was ever successfully carried out. The search for the missing child was pursued unceasingly and thoroughly. Prominent Philadelphians interested themselves in the matter, and seemingly no stone was left unturned. Countless trips were made to Europe, every gypsy camp in the world was searched; the identity of over 400 children was investigated, but without avail. Two men were fatally shot while committing a burglary on Long Island the following year, and while dying confessed that they had stolen the child, but did not divulge its whereabouts.

A third conspirator was subsequently convicted of complicity and sentenced to a long term in prison, protesting his innocence and denying all knowledge of the affair. It is the popular theory that the abductors, at last finding themselves close pressed, murdered the child. Mr Ross is living down at Germantown, a worn out, heart broken old man, but still hoping on that some day, somehow, the little fellow will come back—little no longer, but to his loving memory the same sunny faced, golden haired boy of sixteen years ago.

Three years before the disappearance of the Ross boy Freddie Leib, a pretty little child of 5 years, was stolen in about the same manner at Quincy, Ills. He was never recovered, although the father impoverished himself in the search.

One of the most mysterious cases of recent years was the stealing of Lillie Shaffner, a 14-months-old baby, in this city about five years ago. The family lived on Wesson street, and two older children were wheeling the baby to and fro in front of the house. A strange woman stopped, and after playing with the baby a moment gave the other children some money to go buy candy. When they returned the woman and child had disappeared. It was ascertained that she had boarded a passing street car with the baby in her arms, but that was the last ever seen of either.—Chicago Tribune.

An Amphibious Spinster.

There is a maiden lady in a city not far from Elberton who is so constituted that she cannot live out of water but a short while at a time. After remaining away from a bath tub for a couple of hours she commences to faint and almost suffocates, and to procure relief must at once cover her entire body in cold water. She has in her room a pool of fresh water, and in this she spends a greater part of her time, both winter and summer. Otherwise her health is very good.—Savannah News.

A Disinterested Friend.

The man who never owned a dog doesn't know what it is to have a devoted and disinterested friend. Do you know any creature half so faithful as old Gip, or Nero, or Bruno, or Fido, or Towser, or Rattler? When young you maltreated him dreadfully. You rode on his back, you pulled his ears, you twisted his tail, you kicked him and cuffed him. But he bore your abuse patiently and was always ready to lick the hand that smote him. He bore no grudge against you, but forgot and forgave everything. When you left home he was the last one of the family to say good-by; when you returned he was the first to give you greeting. In youth he was your comforter and protector; now he is your companion and friend.—New York Tribune.

An Old Family.

Mr. De Pink—My dear, I've found a husband for you.

Miss De Pink—Does he belong to an old family?

Mr. De Pink—Yes, indeedy. All his brothers are over 80 and he's gray headed himself.—Philadelphia Record.

Russell has charge of it.

It is announced that L. J. Rose of Los Angeles is going into the business of raising running horses. He has bought a number of the best young thoroughbred mares that can be got and these will be bred to the best stallions. He sold eighty-seven head of trotting stock for $234,930, an average of $2,700 per head. There ought to be some profit in raising trotting stock at such figures.

W. H. Russell came down from Benton on Monday to pay the men at the San Carlos mine. During the past year all the work done at the San Carlos was running a tunnel which is now within forty feet of the ledge and will strike it about three hundred feet below the surface. The ground has been very hard till within the last few days, when a change has taken place and the working has become much easier. The ledge is about seven feet wide at the surface.

ED. INDEPENDENT: The following is a synopsis of the viewers' report in regard to the road to Sylvania District:

"We, the undersigned, Committe selected by the citizens of Big Pine to view, select and report upon the prospects of obtaining a wagon road from Big Pine to Sylvania, Palmetto and vicinity, beg leave to report as follows: Having viewed different routes, to wit, Soldiers' Pass, Coyote Pass, Eureka Valley and other passes we find that each and all of these routes are impracticable—too expensive and not of any advantage in point of shortness. We also find what we consider from a limited investigation a good route from Big Pine to Deep Springs south of what is known as the Ashmore road; but we are compelled to abandon the proposition of constructing a road over this route, at least for the present, for want of time; a road being deemed an immediate necessity in order to compete with what we consider competing roads to other points. Having taken everything into consideration we have arrived at the conclusion to accept the Ashmore road to Gilbert's, the owners of said road agreeing to at once commence repairing it. We also agree in behalf of the citizens of Big Pine and vicinity to repair the road from Gilbert's to the summit of Gilbert's Hill, the cost of which we estimate at $600. The parties holding a controlling interest in the Ashmore road agree to pay back to any parties the amount such parties may see fit to invest in the improvement of the road from Gilbert's house to the summit of Gilbert's Hill. Said agreement to be more fully and definitely arranged in accordance with the wishes of the people of Big Pine and vicinity. We also advise immediate action in order to secure success."

The viewers were S. G. Gregg, George Hall and Dennis Hessian.

The amount mentioned in the above was immediately raised by the citizens of Big Pine. It includes the donation of Brown Brothers & Co. by their traveling agent, H. Lowden, of San Francisco. A. A. Riddle has been appointed as General Superintendent for the citizens and vested with full authority. Work will be commenced on Monday next.

Accidents seem to be in vogue. Mrs. S. G. Gregg and her daughter Carrie when on their way home from town last Sunday night were violently thrown to the ground by a run-away horse. Mrs. Gregg was not very seriously injured but Carrie is still confined to her bed. Were it not for Fred Crocker and his skill with the lasso the result might have been more serious.

Work is being prosecuted on the Big Pine Canal. We must get through before we have to go to Bakersfield. Can't you send some one to take care of the town during the absence of the residents of B. P.? Witnesses? Oh, yes; all witnesses!

Hon. John A. Hannah was with us a few hours this week.

J. W. P. Laird and wife passed through our village on Wednesday.

Scott Broder and Antone Cunha have about fifteen tons of ore ready for shipment.

Our St. Patrick's Day ball took place at Mrs. Sallie M. Bell's. Parties were present from nearly all towns in the county, Bishop being very largely represented. Dancing was kept up until 5:30 a. m., when all returned to their homes tired but pleased with their amusement.

The teacher and pupils of the Big Pine school district are to give an entertainment on the closing day of school. We believe the school closes about the 25th of April.

Saline Valley Borax Deposits.

SALINE VALLEY, March 26th.

ED. INDEPENDENT: The borax deposits in Saline Valley extend over a portion of four townships, viz: Townships, No. 14 S. R. 39 E., No. 14 S. R. 38 E. No. 13 S. R. 38 E. and No. 13 S. R. 29 E., M. D. M. The principal portion of the borax deposit is in the northwest part of township No. 14 S. R. 38 E. The marsh portion of the valley has an area of from 25 to 30 square miles. The best portion of the deposit is at the southwest border of the valley and has an area of two to three square miles. This is the lowest point in the valley, the altitude being about 1,100 feet. The borax belt and a soda belt cross each other at this portion of the valley forming the combination known as borate of soda. The course of these belts, as near as I can determine, is; soda, north 20° east; borax, north, 20° west. The deposits of borate of soda found on the west side of the marsh are heavy and rich, but not regularly distributed over the surface. This indicates that the deposits have been formed by water running in a number of channels, or "washes," from the northeast to the southwest side. The deposit on the east side of the marsh extends for a distance of four to five miles in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction and is rich in borax and very evenly distributed. When the borax found on the surface is removed another deposit speedily forms which seems, judging from ordinary tests, to be as rich as the original deposits. At the northeast edge of the marsh there rises out of the bedrock a number of springs the water of which is strongly impregnated with boracic acid. The water from all these springs quickly sinks into the marsh, the flow being strongest from October till April of each year. The belts of borax and soda already spoken of in their course southerly are far separated at the extreme south side of the valley and on that side of the marsh is found a deposit of borate of lime, more commonly called "cotton-ball." The supply of wood and water in the valley is abundant. In my judgment there is not a place in the United States where borax can be got at so small a cost as in Saline Valley. Messrs Conn & Trudo have made a fairly good road from their works in Saline Valley to Alvord Station on the C. & C. Railroad. This is something for which other locators should not only be thankful, but should be willing to pay a fair proportion of the cost, and by so doing the road could be put in much better condition than it now is. The length of the road is forty-five miles.

Fine Roadster Stallion.

Enos & McSweeny have sold to R. C. Spear of Lone Pine the roadster stallion Flash, sr. c. foaled in 1887. This young stallion should get excellent roadsters as he is a large, stylish animal, of fine form and well bred in trotting lines as the following pedigree will show:

Flash — Prompter 2305 — Blue Bull 75; Prairie Bird
Flash — Lady Nelson — John Nelson; Oregon Nell

Wilson's Blue Bull 75 has as many colts in the 2:30 list as George Wilkes. Prairie Bird's record is 2:28½. Prompter with but six weeks' training won a five heat stallion race and gained a record of of 2:33¼. He is the sire of Apex, record 2:26. John Nelson has four in the 2:30 list. Lady Nelson showed a 3:00 gait when broken at two years. Flash will make the season at Lone Pine.

Antare.

S. P. Smith of Bishop has been traveling through the valley this week with the trotting stallion Antare, owned by Holbert & Smith. The following pedigree is given with the breeder's certificate:

Antare — Antares 6120 — Electioneer — Hamblet'n'n 10; Green Mountain Maid
Antares 6120 — Columbine — A. W. Richmond; Columbia thoroughbred
Antare — Iowa Chief 525 — Bashaw 50; Topsy
Antare — ——— — Tornado 502; ——s. t. b.

Antare is a dark bay, slighly dappled; stand 15.2 hands and weighs 1,130 pounds and is round and compactly built. His sire is one of the great Electioneer-Columbine family, his full brothers Anteeo and Antevolo selling for $30,000 and $35,000 respectively. He will be bred to a few mares this season and then be put in training for exhibition this fall, when horsemen will have an opportunity of judging his merits as a performer.

Leg Broken.

On Thursday of last week Lew Payson was on his way to Deep Spring, accompanied by his brother. When going up the mountain about one and a half miles beyond Ashmore's toll-house Lew was walking beside the horses and holding the lines. The horses got scared at something and started to run. Lew was thrown down and the wagon passed over him, breaking his left leg between the knee and ankle. The team kept on running with the other man in the wagon. Lew crawled back to Ashmore's place where the leg was bandaged up as well as possible and he was taken back to Big Pine. Dr. Middleton put the broken leg in proper condition and Lew is now doing well.

An Outrage.

Fifty-eight witnesses have been subpœnaed in Owens Valley to attend the trial of Elliott at Bakersfield. It is absolutely certain that not ten of the whole number know anything of the murder committed by Elliott except common rumor. There is no escaping the conclusion that the only reason for demanding the attendance of such a large number of people, who must be entirely useless as witnesses, is a determination on the part of Elliott and his counsel to inflict as much injury upon the people of Inyo county as possible.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

Apparently they were not very pleasant ones. He walked round the room, which was reeking of patchouli or some such compound, well mixed with the odor of stale cigar smoke, looking absently at the gewgaw ornaments. On the mantelpiece were some photographs, and among them, to his disgust, he saw one of himself. With something as near an oath as he ever indulged in, he seized it, and setting fire to it over the gas, waited till the flames began to scorch his fingers, and then flung it, still flaming, down into the grate. Then he looked at himself in the glass over the mantelpiece—the room was full of mirrors—and laughed bitterly at the incongruity of his gentleman like, respectable and even refined appearance, in that vulgar, gaudy, vicious looking room.

Suddenly he bethought him of the letter in his wife's handwriting which he had stolen from the pocket of Edward Cossey's coat. He drew it out, and throwing the tea gown and the interminable glove off the sofa, sat down and commenced to read it. It was, as he had expected, a love letter, a wildly passionate love letter, breathing language which in places almost touched the beauty of poetry, vows of undying affection that were throughout redeemed from vulgarity and even from silliness by their utter earnestness and self abandonment. Had the letter been one written under happy circumstances and innocent of offense against morality, it would have been a beautiful letter, for passion at its highest has always a beauty of its own.

He read it through, and then carefully folded it and restored it to his pocket. "The woman has a heart," he said to himself; "no one can doubt it. And yet I could never touch it, though God knows, however much I wronged her, I loved her—yes, and love her now. Well, it is a good bit of evidence if ever I dare to use it. It is a game of bluff between me and her, and I expect that in the end the boldest player will win."

He rose from the sofa—the atmosphere of the place stifled him—and going to the window he threw it open and stepped out on to the balcony. It was a lovely moonlight night, though chilly, and for London the street was a quiet one.

Taking a chair, he sat down there upon the balcony and began to think. His heart was softened by misery, and his mind fell into a tender groove. He thought of his long dead mother, whom he had dearly loved, and of how he used to say his prayers to her, and of how she sung hymns to him on Sunday evenings. Her death had seemed to choke all the beauty out of his being at the time, and yet now he thanked God that she was dead. And then he thought of the accursed woman who had been his ruin, and of how she had entered into his life and corrupted and destroyed him. Next there rose up before him a vision of Belle, Belle as he had first seen her, a maid of 17, the only child of that drunken old village doctor, now also long since dead, and how the sight of her had for awhile stayed the corruption of his heart because he grew to love her. And then he married Belle by foul means, and the woman rose up in his path again, and he learned that his wife hated him with all the energy of her passionate heart. Then came degradation after degradation, and the abandonment of principle after principle, replaced only by a fierce craving for respectability and rest—a long, long struggle, which ever ended in new lapses from the right, till at length he saw himself a hardened schemer, remorselessly pursued by a fury from whom there was no escape. And yet he knew that under other circumstances he might have been a good and happy man—leading an honorable life. But now all hope had gone; that which he was he must be till the end. He leaned his head upon the stone railing in front of him and wept, yes, wept in the anguish of his soul, praying to God for deliverance from the burden of his sins, and yet well knowing that he had none to hope for. For his chance was gone and his fate fixed.

Presently a hansom cab came rattling down the street and pulled up at the door.

"Now for it," said Mr. Quest to himself, as he metaphorically shook himself together.

Next minute he heard a voice, which he knew only too well—a loud high voice—say from the cab, "Well, open the door, stupid, can't you?"

"Certainly, my lady fair," replied another voice—a coarse, somewhat husky male voice—"adored Edith, in one moment."

"Come, stow that rot, and let me out," replied the adored Edith, sharply; and, in another moment, a large man in evening clothes, a horrible, vulgar, carnal looking man, with red cheeks and a hanging under lip, emerged into the lamp light and turned to hand the lady out. As he did so the woman Ellen advanced from the doorway, and, going to the cab door, whispered something to its occupant.

"Halloo, Johnnie," said that lady, as she descended from the cab, so loudly that Mr. Quest on the balcony could hear every word, "you must be off, Mr. d'Aubigne has turned up, and perhaps he won't think three good company, so you had just best take this cab back again, my son, and that will save me the trouble of paying it. Come, cut."

"D'Aubigne," growled the flashy man, with an oath; "what do I care about D'Aubigne? Advance, D'Aubigne, and all's well. You needn't be jealous of me, I'm a married man. I am"——

"Now stop that noise and be off. He's a lawyer and he might not freeze on to you. Don't you understand?"

"Well, I'm a lawyer, too, and a pretty sharp one—arcades ambo," said Johnnie, with a coarse laugh; "and I tell you what it is, Edith, it ain't good enough to cart a fellow down into this howling wilderness and then send him away without even a drink; lend us another fiver, at any rate. It ain't good enough, I say."

"Good enough or not, you'll have to go, and you don't get any fivers out of me to-night. Now, pack sharp, or I'll know the reason why," and she pointed toward the cab in a fashion that seemed to cow her companion, for without another word he turned and got into it.

"Where to, sir?" asked the cabman.

"Oh, to hell or the Haymarket, it's all one," he growled, flinging himself back into the corner. In another moment the cab had turned, and he was gone, muttering curses as he went.

The woman, who was none other than Mrs. d'Aubigne, alias Edith Jones, alias the Tiger, turned and entered the house, accompanied by her servant, Ellen, and presently Mr. Quest heard the rustle of her satin dress upon the stairs. He stepped back into the darkness of the balcony and waited. She opened the door, entered and closed it behind her, and then, a little dazzled by the light, stood for some seconds looking about her for her visitor. She was a thin, tall woman, who might have been any age between forty and fifty, with the wreck of a very fine agile looking figure. Her face, which was plentifully bedaubed with paint and powder, was sharp, fierce and handsome, and crowned with a mane of false yellow hair. Her eyes were cold and blue, her lips thin and rather drawn, so as to show a double line of large and gleaming teeth. She was dressed in a rich and hideous tight fitting gown of yellow satin, barred with black, and on her arms were long bright yellow gloves. She moved lightly and silently, and looked round her with a long searching gaze like that of a cat, and her general appearance conveyed an idea of hunger and wicked ferocity. Such was the outward appearance of the Tiger, and of a truth it justified her name. "Why, where the dickens has he got to?" she said aloud; "I wonder if he has given me the slip?"

"Here I am, Edith," said Mr. Quest, quietly, as he stepped from the balcony into the room.

"Oh, there you are, are you?" she said, "hiding away in the dark—just like your nasty mean ways. Well, my long lost one, so you have come home at last, and brought the tin with you. Well, give us a kiss," and she advanced on him with her long arms outspread.

Mr Quest shivered visibly, and stretching out his hand, stopped her from coming near him.

"No, thank you," he said; "I don't like paint."

The taunt stopped her, and for a moment an evil light shone in her cold eyes.

"No wonder I have to paint," she said, "when I am so worn out with poverty and hard work—not like the lovely Mrs. Q——, who has nothing to do all day except spend the money that I ought to have. I'll tell you what it is, my fine fellow, you had better be careful, or I'll have that pretty cuckoo out of her soft nest, and pluck her borrowed feathers off her, like the monkey did to the parrot."

"Perhaps you had better stop that talk, and come to business. I am in no mood for this sort of thing, Edith," and he turned round, shut the window, and drew the blind.

"Oh, all right, I'm agreeable, I'm sure. Stop a bit, though—I must have a brandy and soda first. I am as dry as a lime kiln, and so would you be if you had to sing comic songs at a music hall for a living. There, that's better," and she put down the empty glass and threw herself on to the sofa. "Now then, tune up as much as you like. How much tin have you brought?"

Mr. Quest sat down by the table, and then, as though suddenly struck by a thought, rose again, and going to the door, opened it and looked out into the passage. There was nobody there, so he shut the door again, locked it, and then, under cover of drawing the curtain which hung over it, slipped the key into his pocket.

"What are you at there?" said the woman, suspiciously.

"I was just looking to see that Ellen was not at the keyhole, that's all. It would not be the first time that I have caught her there."

"Just like your nasty low ways again," she said. "You've got some game on. I'll be bound that you have got some game on."

Mr. Quest seated himself again, and without taking any notice of the last remark, began the conversation.

"I have brought you two hundred and fifty pounds," he said.

"Two hundred and fifty pounds," she said, jumping up with a savage laugh. "No, my boy, you don't get off for that if I know it. Why, I owe all that at this moment."

"You had better sit down and be quiet," he said, "or you will not get two hundred and fifty pence. In your own interest I recommend you to sit down."

There was something about the man's voice and manner that scared the female savage before him, fierce as she was, and she sat down.

"Listen," he went on; "you are continually complaining of poverty. I come to your house—your house, mind you, not your rooms—and I find the debris of a card party lying about. I see champagne bottles freshly opened there in the corner. I see a dressing gown on the sofa that must have cost twenty or thirty pounds. I hear some brute associate of yours out in the street asking you to lend him another 'fiver.' You complain of poverty, and you have had over four hundred pounds from me this year alone, and I know that you earn twelve pounds a week at the music hall, and not five as you say. No, do not trouble to lie to me, for I have made inquiries."

"Spying again," said the woman, with a sneer.

"Yes, spying, if you like, but there it is. And now to the point. I am not going on supplying you with money at this rate. I cannot do it, and I will not do it. I am going to give you two hundred and fifty pounds now, and as much every year, and not one farthing more."

Once more she sat up. "You must be mad," she said, in a tone that sounded more like a snarl than a human voice. "Are you such a fool as to believe that I will be put off with two hundred and fifty pounds a year—I, your legal wife? I'll have you in the dock first—in the dock for bigamy."

"Yes," he answered, "I do believe it, for a reason that I shall give you presently. But first I want to go through our joint history, very briefly, just to justify myself, if you like. Five-and-twenty years ago, or was it six-and-twenty, I was a boy of 18 and you were a woman of 20, a house maid in my mother's house, and you made love to me. Then my mother was called away to nurse my brother who died at school at Portsmouth, and I fell sick of scarlet fever, and you nursed me through it—it would have been kinder if you had poisoned me—and in my weak state you got a great hold over my mind, and I became attached to you, and you were handsome in those days. Then you dared me to marry you, and partly out of bravado, partly from affection, I took out a license, to do which I made a false declaration that I was over age, and gave a false name of the parish in which we resided. Next day, half tipsy and not knowing what I did, I went through the form of marriage with you, and a few days afterward my mother returned, observed that we were unduly intimate, and dismissed you. You went without a word as to our marriage, which we both looked on as a farce, and for years I lost sight of you. Fifteen years afterward, when I had almost forgotten this adventure of my youth, I became acquainted with a young lady with whom I fell in love, and whose fortune, though not large, was enough to help me considerably in my profession as a country lawyer, in which I was doing well. I thought that you were dead, or, that if you lived, the fact of my having made the false declaration of age and locality would be enough to invalidate the marriage, as would certainly have been the case if I had also made a false declaration of names; and my impulses and interests prompting me to take the risk, I married that lady. Then it was that you hunted me down, and then for the first time I did what I ought to have done before, and took the best legal opinions as to the validity of the former marriage, which, to my horror, I found was undoubtedly a binding one. You also took opinions and came to the same conclusions. Since then the history has been a simple one. Out of my wife's fortune of ten thousand pounds I paid you no less than seven thousand as hush money, on your undertaking to leave this country for America and never returning here again. I should have done better to face it out, but I feared to lose my position and practice. You left and wrote to me that you, too, had married in Chicago, but in eighteen months you returned, having squandered every farthing of the money, when I found that the story of your marriage was an impudent lie."

"Yes," she put in with a laugh, "and a rare time I had with that seven thousand, too."

"You returned and demanded more blackmail, and I had no choice but to give and give and give. In eleven years you had something over twenty-three thousand pounds from me, and you continually demand more. I believe that you will admit that that is a truthful statement of the case," and he paused.

"Oh, yes," she said, "I am not going to dispute that, but what then? I am your wife, and you have committed bigamy, and if you don't go on paying me I'll have you in jail, and that's all about it, old boy. You can't get out of it any way, you nasty mean brute," she went on, raising her voice and drawing up her thin lips so as to show the white teeth beneath. "So you thought that you were going to play it down low on me in that fashion, did you? Well, you've just made a little mistake for once in your life, and I'll tell you what it is, you shall smart for it. I'll teach you what it is to leave your lawful wife to starve while you go and live with another woman in luxury. You can't help yourself; I can ruin you if I like. Supposing I go to a magistrate and ask for a warrant, what can you do to keep me quiet?"

Suddenly the virago stopped as though she were shot, and her fierce countenance froze into an appearance of terror, as well it might. Mr Quest, who had been sitting listening to her with his hand over his eyes, had risen, and his face was as the face of a fiend, alight with an intense and quiet fury which seemed to be burning inwardly. On the mantelpiece lay a sharp pointed Goorka knife, which one of Mrs. d'Aubigne's admirers, who had traveled, had presented to her. It was an awful looking weapon, and keen edged as a razor. This he had taken up and held in his right hand, and with it he was advancing toward her lying on the sofa.

"If you make a sound I will kill you at once," he said, speaking in a low and husky voice.

She had been paralyzed with terror, for, like most bullies, male and female, she was a great coward, but the sound of his voice roused her, and the first note of a harsh screech had already issued from her lips, when he sprung upon her, and placing the sharp point of the knife against her throat, pricked her with it. "Be quiet," he said, "or you are a dead woman."

She stopped screaming and lay there, her face twitching, and her eyes bright with terror.

"Now, listen," he said, in the same husky voice. "You incarnate fiend, you asked me just now how I could keep you quiet. I will tell you. I can keep you quiet by running this knife up to the hilt in your throat," and once more he pricked her with its point. "It would be murder," he went on, "but I do not care for that. You and others between you have not made my life so pleasant for me that I am especially anxious to perserve it. Now, listen. I will give you the two hundred and fifty pounds that I have brought, and you shall have the two hundred and fifty a year; but if you ever attempt to extort more, or if you molest me, either by spreading stories against my character or by means of legal prosecution, or in any other way, I swear by the Almighty that I will murder you. I may have to kill myself afterward—I don't care if I do, provided I kill you first. Do you understand me, you tiger, as you call yourself? If I have to hunt you down as they do tigers, I will come up with you at last, and kill you. You have driven me to it, and, by heaven! I will. Come, speak up, and tell me that you understand, or I may change my mind and do it now," and once more he touched her with the knife.

She rolled off the sofa on to the floor and lay there, writhing in abject terror, looking in the shadow of the table, where her long, lithe form was twisting about in its robe of yellow, barred with black, more like one of the great cats from which she took her name than a human being. "Spare me!" she gasped; "spare me! I don't want to die! I swear that I will never meddle with you again."

"I don't want your oaths, woman," answered the stern form, bending over her with the knife. "A liar you have been from your youth up, and a liar you will be to the end. Do you understand what I have said?"

"Yes, yes, I understand. Ah! put away that knife; I can't bear it! It makes me sick."

"Very well, then, get up."

She tried to rise, but her knees would not support her, so she sat upon the floor.

"Now," said Mr. Quest, replacing the knife upon the mantelpiece, "here is your money," and he flung a bag of notes and gold into her lap, at which she clutched eagerly and almost automatically. "The £250 will be paid on the first of January in each year, and not one farthing more will you get from me. Remember what I tell you: try to molest me by word or act and you are a dead woman; I forbid you even to write to me. Now, go to the devil in your own way," and without another word he took up his hat and umbrella, walked to the door, unlocked it, and went, leaving the Tiger huddled together upon the floor,

And went, leaving the Tiger huddled together upon the floor.

For half an hour or more the woman remained thus, the bag of money in her hand. Then she struggled to her feet, her face livid and her body shaking.

"Ugh!" she said, "I'm as weak as a cat. I thought he meant to do it that time, and he will, too, for sixpence. He's got me there, I'm afraid to die. I can't bear to die. It is better to lose the money than to die. Besides, if I blow on him he'll put me in chokey and I shan't be able to get anything out of him, and when he comes out he'll do for me." And then losing her temper, she shook her first in the air and broke out into a flood of language such as would neither be pretty to hear nor good to repeat.

Mr. Quest was a man of judgment. At last he had realized that in one way, and one only, can a wild beast be tamed, and that is by terror.

(To be Continued.)

The olive is one of the long-lived trees. The following extracts are from an eloquent address by the Hon. Chas. Dondero, of this city, himself a native Italian: "According to history, the great olive trees yet seen around Tivoli, whose gigantic forms rival the majestic Sequoias of the Sierra, were already old when Romulus traced with the plow the walls of Rome. Since then mighty rulers, powerful empires, bright and barbarous civilizations, have arisen and disappeared; but the olive giants, untouched by all vandalic invaders, respected by the hurricanes of thirty centuries, are there, covering nearly an acre of ground each, vigorous and productive as in the days of Christ." Yet it is not claimed that the average life of trees in an orchard would reach more than 250 years.

In an English theatre recently the orchestra between the acts was playing very loudly and two ladies in a front row were endeavoring to converse at the same time. They had to raise their voices considerably, and as the orchestra suddenly reached a low passage the voice of one of the ladies became cruelly distinct just as she remarked: "I wear silk underclothes."

At Butte, Mont., last week, Thomas Bryant, aged sixteen, killed and robbed his mother, the keeper of a miners' boarding-house. He barely escaped lynching and gave himself up to the authorities.

A bad smash-up was caused in the Santa Fe yard at Albuquerque last week by a collision between a switch engine and the California West-bound train. William Taylor, engineer of the passenger, was killed, both engines crushed and the passengers shaken up, but not injured.

Slightly Mixed.

A story apropos of the people whose infirmity is to get other people's infirmities mixed up:

The other night at the supper table Mrs. Cheeryble was discoursing pleasantly upon the people and things she had seen that afternoon down town.

"I met that Dobson boy," she said, "and I was greatly pleased to see that he doesn't squint anywhere near as much as he used to."

"He doesn't squint, mamma!" said Ethel, in a puzzled sort of way.

"No—at least scarcely at all."

"Why, mamma! the Dobson boy never squinted!"

Mrs. Cheeryble looked lost.

"He never squinted?"

"Why, no; not in the least!"

"Well, he did something. What was the matter with him?"

"He is very deaf, mamma."

"So he is, to be sure. I knew he had an infirmity of some kind."—Boston Transcript.

A Remunerative Practice.

Young Lawyer—You have advertised that you are going to retire from practice and want to sell out.

Old Lawer—Yes. Do you wish to buy a good practice?

"Yes. How many clients have you?"

"Two."

"Is that a practice?"

"Young man, I've lived off those two clients for sixteen years. One's a claimant under a contested will and the other's fighting for an Alabama claim." (They come to terms.)—Philadelphia Society.

Artless.

Miss Oldun—No, Mr. Hollings, I am getting too old for the assemblies.

Hollings, '93—Oh, don't say that, Miss Oldun.

"Why, I feel like a faded leaf among all these young buds. Do you ever press autumn leaves, Mr. Hollings?"

(Great embarrassment from '93.)—Harvard Lampoon.

He Knew Him.

Spinner—What! You say the general is an old time friend? Why, he is a Mexican, and has lived in his own country all his life.

Grinner—No, he hasn't. When I was a boy he came with his father to Boston and visited our next door neighbor. He got me to look through a hole in the fence, then squeezed a lemon in my eye.—National Weekly.

The Tears He Shed.

Father—Aha, so you ran away from Sunday school to go skating and broke through the ice, did you?

Son—No, I didn't. I fell asleep in church and got locked in.

Father—But how did you get so wet?

Son—That's from the tears I shed when I waked up.—Binghamton Republican.

The Dominie Shows His Spunk.

"We lay the corner stone of the new chapel today."

"I suppose you'll fill it with papers and coins?"

"No; I shall put in a dozen pairs of slippers and four mince pies I received for Christmas."—New York Sun.

Similar Weather.

"Did you ever see such weather as this?" asked a gentleman of an Irish friend, who happened to pass.

"Yes, I have," replied Pat.

"When?"

"In June, begorra," was the witty response.—Atlanta Constitution.

FAVORED BY FORTUNE.

A Fort Leavenworth Coterie Draws $5,000 in The Louisiana State Lottery.

Twelve members of Company K, 13th Infantry, at the Fort, are in a very pleasant frame of mind just now. They have just received, through the Pacific Express company, $5,000, their portion of the second capital prize of $10,000 in the last drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery.

The money was paid to Sergeant Thos. Marriott and by him divided between the twelve who had pooled their issues. Each put in 50 cents and as luck would have it, one of the six tickets purchased with the $3 drew one-twentieth of the $100,000 prize.

The following are the lucky men, each of whom gets about $416. Sergeant Marriott, Corporals Black and Iken, and Privates Loftus, Neidowlun, Heart, Elliott, Reno, Wilhelm, Pulley, Kelley and Nutzen.

Sergeant Marriott stated that he had tried the lottery quite often and had frequently won small sums. Of course this is the biggest haul he has yet made. Most of the lucky winners have deposited their money with the paymaster, where it is safe from any temptation.

The Sergeant is loud in his praise of The Louisiana State Lottery, as he may well be; $416 is not a princely sum, but it is quite a respectable sum. Fortune smiles upon the humble quite as often as upon the high in life, fortune of course being represented in this case by The Louisiana State Lottery Company, whose prizes are far oftener drawn by those who occupy an indifferently exalted station in life than by the 400. On this account its smiles are the more welcome and those who are fortunate enough to draw prizes are benefitted to a greater extent. Many a person has been started in life through receiving just such a windfall as that recounted in the foregoing.—Leavenworth (Kans.) Times, Jan. 30.

Peculiar

To itself in many important particulars, Hood's Sarsaparilla is different from and superior to any other medicine.

Peculiar in combination, proportion and preparation of ingredients, Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses the full curative value of the best known remedies of the vegetable kingdom.

Peculiar in its medicinal merit, Hood's Sarsaparilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown.

Peculiar in strength and economy—Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine of which can truly be said, "100 doses one dollar." Medicines in larger and smaller bottles require larger doses, and do not produce as good results as Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Peculiar in its "good name at home"—there is more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell, where it it made, than of all other blood purifiers.

Peculiar in its phenomenal record of sales abroad, no other preparation has ever attained such popularity in so short a time. Be sure to get

POOR HUMANITY!

The common lot is one of sorrow say—at least—the pessimists, they who look at the worst side. Certainly what would otherwise be a bright existence, is often shadowed by some ailment that overhangs it like a pall, obscuring perpetually the radiance that else would light the path. Such an ailment, and a very common one, is nervousness, or in other words, weakness of the nervous system, a condition only irremediable where inefficient or improper means are taken to relieve it. The concurrent experience of nervous people who have persistently used Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is, that it conquers entirely supersensitiveness of the nerves, as well as diseases—so called—which are invited and sustained by their chronic weakness. As the nerves gain stamina from the great tonic the trouble disappears. Use the Bitters for malaria, rheumatism, billiousness and kidney troubles.

It is well enough to say that thirteen is an unlucky number, this country started in business with thirteen States, and seems to be still holding her own.

IT WAS JUST IN TIME.

G. C. Bartholomew, Kalkaska, Mich., says: "I located in this place five years ago, having formerly resided in Troy, N. Y. I have been a great sufferer from what the physicians of Troy called Bright's disease. I used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y. All the terrible symptoms of the disease are gone. I have no traces of any disorder of the kidneys, liver or bladder. Who would begrudge the cost of this medicine (one dollar a bottle) for such a blessing or refuse this simple though sincere token of gratitude for being perfectly cured? I owe everything to Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, and hope this will induce others to use the medicine who suffer from any kidney, liver or blood disorder."

THE PRIDE OF HIS CLASS.

He was a bright, handsome boy of sixteen, sunny tempered, brilliant and engaging, the delight of his parents, the joy of his home, and the pride of his class. But a shadow fell across his bright prospects. It began with a trifling cough; soon came premonitions of consumption, his strength failed, his cheeks grew hollow, and he seemed doomed to an early grave. Then a friend advised Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. He tried it and was saved. Health and strength returned, his cheerful voice rang out again across the school playground, his cheeks again grew rosy, his eyes bright. He is still "the pride of his class" and he graduates this year with highest honors.

HEALTHY OFFSPRING

are only begotten of healthy mothers. How important, then, that the health of the future mothers of our land should be carefully guarded. Our girls need the tenderest care as they are entering upon womanhood. At this critical period of their existence it often happens, through neglect, that the seeds of distressing ailments are sown, which afflict them in after years. As a regulator and promoter of functional action at this important stage, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a most reliable agent for building up the strength and system and establishing the proper functions. "Favorite Prescription" is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded, by an experienced and skillful physician and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. —Lemon Extract: Take the pulp of two lemons and the peel of four, pour over it half a pint of alcohol, let stand one week, then strain out the pulp; return the skin, let stand another week and strain again.—Farm and Fireside.

—Cheese Sandwiches: Cut some thin slices of brown bread, spread a little butter over them and lay on the top of half the slices squares of cheese, put them in a baking-dish in a hot oven until the cheese is melted, lay a slice of warm toast on the top of each slice of cheese, and serve at once.

—Tapioca Fruit: Pour a quart of boiling water over a cupful of tapioca and let it stand an hour. Lay cut peaches or apples (fresh or canned) upon a buttered dish; add two cupfuls of sugar, a little lemon or vanilla to the tapioca; pour this over the fruit and bake one hour. —Pickles of almost every variety are useful for garnishing fish as well as cold meats. THE HARDEST OF WORK.

An Exhausted Business Man Better Off Than a Slave of Society.

A gaunt, haggard-looking man, whose business keeps him rushing from the opening until the close of every work day, was sympathized with a few days ago by a friend.

"I tell you old man," said the friend, "you work too hard. Why don't you take things easy? You've got money enough to let things wag their own way now,"

"We are a hard-working family," was the reply, "and when I get home I shall find the whole lot of us just as tired as I am, and nobody in the house feeling bright except the servants. My daughter used to be rosy and fresh-looking until she began going into society, and how she ever stands it now is more than I can tell. I don't know a man down town who works as hard as she does, and she keeps pegging away at it when I'm sleeping."

"What does she do, for heaven's sake?"

"Well, I don't know every thing she does, because I haven't reached that point of interest in her mode of enjoying herself to keep notes. She's in society. Don't you understand that? Well, I don't either, but that explanation seems to be all that is necessary from her when I advise her to let up and take a rest. I suppose she's got an end to keep up, and she's struggling hard to keep it elevated, I tell you. Yesterday she was up at eight o'clock, because she had to go shopping. She came in at luncheon pretty well fagged out. Then she had a dozen calls to make, and when she came in to dinner she looked so poorly I felt tired for her. There was a reception somewhere at night, and just before I retired a dude came around and carried her off to it. She came in along toward midnight, but this didn't prevent her from getting up this morning at eight o'clock again. So far, she belongs to a literary club that meets Tuesday, a Dorcas circle that meets Wednesday, a debating club that meets Thursday, a dancing class that meets Friday, and a missionary club that meets Saturday. Then her nights are taken up with a bowling club, a progressive euchre club, a theater club, receptions, balls, parties and the aforementioned dude. Sandwiched between all these are innumerable social calls, luncheons, and such things. Sundays are roaring days with her, too. She is a teacher in a Sunday-school, and she never misses evening service. Of course she has a good many other things to look after, but I can't recollect what they are just now. I lead a lazy life as compared with the life she leads. Being in business isn't half as hard as being in society."—N. Y. Sun.

Explorer Stanley's Hair.

The correspondent who went up country to meet Stanley describes his hair as being quite white. This he ascribes to the privations of the expedition. But those who met Mr. Stanley when he was formerly in this country will be reminded by the telegrams of an incident, regarding which the great explorer was some years ago twitted by his friends. As a matter of fact, his hair had become white long ago. But Mr. Stanley did not appreciate the venerable appearance which his gray locks gave him. They became black again a good deal more suddenly than they had grown white. In view of the chance of another curious change of this kind, it is rather awkward that their present color should have been so universally made known. —London Letter.

FAMOUS SNUFF-TAKERS.

Anecdotes of Great Men Who Were Fond of a Pinch or Two.

When snuff-taking was fashionable an English nobleman calculated that a person addicted to the habit wasted upon his nose thirty-six and a half days in the year. A snuff-taker took one pinch every ten minutes, and each pinch, with its accompaniments occupied a minute and a half. Allowing sixteen hours to the day, he would be busy two hours and twenty-four minutes every day, or thirty-six and a half days in the year.

Talleyrand insisted that diplomatists, at least, did not waste time by snuff-taking. It afforded them, he said, an opportunity of delaying and thus of gaining time for framing a reply which was not ready at hand. It also allowed the removal of one's eyes from those of the questioner, and occupied the hands whose fidgeting might betray a nervousness that had better be concealed.

Archbishop Whately acted upon Talleyrand's hint while an Oxford professor. When he had put a pithy question to a student, who delayed answering until he had unraveled it, the professor found it convenient to take a pinch of snuff, as it helped him to allay his impatience.

A sketch drawn of him represents the logic class assembled, and Whately, while yet in the doorway, calling out:

"Mr. Johnson, explain the nature of the third operation of the mind."

Then he flings himself in the chair, crosses the calf of one leg over the knee of the other, and, balancing himself on the two hind legs of the chair, he shows signs of impatience before Mr. Johnson has gathered his wits together. Out comes his huge snuff-box, from which a handful of snuff is administered to his nose and sprinkled upon his waistcoat. It soothes him so that, when Johnson answers in the words of the text-book, he is calm enough to give a luminous exposition of the subject.

Darwin, the naturalist, used snuff to stimulate his mind during working hours. That he might not take too many pinches, he kept a jar of snuff on the hall table. The distance between the hall and his study acted as a check upon over-indulgence.

But the chink of the lid of the snuff-jar was a familiar sound in the family. Sometimes, when in the drawing-room, Darwin would suggest that the study fire must be burning low. The family smiled as he went out ostensibly to replenish it, but really to get a pinch of snuff.

An eloquent preacher of Glasgow, the Rev. William Anderson, was so addicted to snuff that he would take a pinch in the pulpit. Once, while uttering the words, "My soul cleaveth to the dust," he took a pinch of snuff. He lamented the mastery which the habit had gained over him, and once, while preaching from the text, "All is vanity," treated his nose to snuff and then said, "And this also is vanity."—Youth's Companion.

FOR ENGAGED GIRLS.

How They Should Act in the Presence of Their Sweethearts.

When your sweetheart comes to see you, don't be foolish enough to confine your sweetness to him alone. Have him in where all of the rest of the household are. Let the talk and the chatter and the music and the playing of games be in the home circle. Then the few minutes that he gets with you by yourself will seem all the more delightful, and he will think you the most loving little creature in the world. Men are much more observant than they are credited with being, and the man worth having as a husband is the one who will appreciate your love for those of your own people, and will see that as you make a small part in one home, you are becoming adapted for the central figure in another.

Never say that you don't expect a man to marry your whole family. It's vulgar. You do. That is, if you are a good daughter and a loving sister. You want him to be one with you in sympathy and in affection, and as you take his name so you assume the responsibilities as far as his people are concerned. You two are the most of each other—your love for each should be the greatest, but you can not isolate yourselves and insist that you have no duties outside your own home. If you do this you become narrow and selfish, and you are quite too nice a girl for that. So remember when he comes, this bridegroom of yours, that his heart is bound the tighter to you if the ribbon used to hold it has written upon it in golden letters, "Love and consideration for those at home."—Ladies' Home Journal.

BRIGHT AS EMERALDS.

A Strange Beetle Found on the Caribbean Islands.

When we rejoice in the sight of our own summer meadows flashing with fiery sparks in a rhythmic dance, we can afford to be glad that in tropical countries the firefly makes a still more brilliant display. The firefly of the West Indies—the cucujo, an inch long beetle—is occasionally brought to this country as a curiosity, and if fed on sugar-cane and kept in a moist atmosphere it can be preserved in health for several weeks.

The people of the Carribean Islands use these beetles for ornament, confined in folds of gauze, where the beautful green light which they emit—their red light flashes only in flying—is more varied and splendid than any emerald that ever shone in a king's coronet. A number of them together under glass make a sufficient illumination for dressing or for reading without producing any heat. A cousin of this firefly is found in the equatorial regions of South America, where Humbolt said it repeated in stream and forest the spectacle of the starry heavens above.—Harper's Bazar.

AN ANTE-WAR STORY.

How a Bright Young Slave Escaped Being Sold to a Dealer.

A little while ago a colored man from an adjoining county came over into this county, his former home, and met many old friends. To one he related a remarkable episode of the days "befo' the wah."

He says he was as tough a mulatto as the country ever produced, and his young master resolved to "send him down the river," as the slave owners used to express it. One day the young master told him to have the horses ready, and they would depart early the next morning for Knoxville. The young master had received information that a certain slave buyer from the cotton fields would visit the city mentioned in quest of "likely negro men."

The early dawn found the young farmer and his valuable human property speeding away over the smooth road south. After they had gone a little way, "Rich," for that was the cognomen by which the "likely boy" was known, inquired of his master if he was going to Knoxville to put into execution a threat he had often heard him make—to sell him to a cotton planter. The master told him it was his mission. Rich became much affected by the announcement and shed tears. He recalled the hours of their boyhood, and dwelt upon the pathetic in general. The young master's heart was touched, but his resolve was not.

Night came on, as it always did when travelers by the "Old Wilderness Road" got well into the mountains. A jug of fine old Bourbon steadied their nerves and brought balmy sleep to the restoration of their strained energies.

Next morning they were up with the lark, and all day they talked about the endless separation soon to follow, pausing occasionally to admire the rugged scenery and take a drink. The rabbit hunts by day, the coon hunts by night, the romps, the fights they had, the floggings they had caught from "the old man" were all lived over again.

Another night and another day and their journey had ended. But the raid on the big jug had not. They "hit it purty lively" that "last night on earth together forever and evermore." They were comfortably full long before midnight. At least the young master was full of old liquor and the slave was full of pretense. He had dropped upon a scheme.

With dawn, Rich was up moving about the city. A shave, clean clothes, a cigar, a cane, and many extras were added. Finally he sought the slave buyer and introduced himself as Mr.—— of Madison County, Kentucky, stated that he was in the city with the "splendid young nigger" of which he had written him, and was now ready for a trade. The boy was described in glowing terms, and the price fixed at $1,500, which the trader said he would give, provided the description was accurate. So they proceeded to the tavern and into a little back room, where the young master was found snoring away on a pallet beside the bed where Rich had taken the precaution to tumble him before going out. His beard of several days' growth, dusty and soiled attire, unkempt hair, and general appearance was any thing but attractive.

"Fifteen hundred!" gruffly remarked the old dealer as he glanced at the pitiful-looking object. "Fifteen hundred dollars for that thing! I wouldn't give you a cent more than half that much," and he walked out on the street. It is useless to say they didn't get their prices near enough for a trade.

About noon the young master awoke, not feeling the best in the world. He was compelled to borrow a shoe horn to put on his hat, and there was a mighty bad taste in his mouth, to say nothing of considerable red in his eye and a feeling of a sort of goneness in general about his stomach. Rich told him that he had been out to see the buyer, and the old fellow wanted to know the price, as all depended on that—the least he'd take was the question, and to be in a hurry, as he, the buyer, had made about all the purchases he wanted and was ready to leave town. The young master called for paper and envelope and wrote as follows:

"Dear Sir: You have seen the boy. My lowest price is $1,200. He is worth every cent of it." The note was duly conveyed and was soon returned with an answer on the back, saying: "We can't trade."

The following day the well-rested horses, the happy mulatto and a disappointed white man "might have been seen wending their solitary way through the woods" toward Kentucky.—Richmond (Va.) Climax.

HAPPY YOUNGSTERS.

Little Japs Have Gay Times and Very Amusing Playthings.

Surely the children of Japan must have a far better time than any others in the world, since the grown people in that far-away country are such pleasure lovers, and the very toys the boys and girls have to play with are such ingenious inventions. In no respects has the originality of contrivance, so characteristic of the Japanese, exhibited itself more markedly than in their playthings. No European would ever have imagined, however remotely, the least absurd of them.

The Japanese kite represents in itself, in its endless modifications, the solution of aerial problems suggested at by Ben Franklin. Curiously enough no Anglo-Saxon boy can fly such a kite; to accomplish the feat requires an instinct essentially Japanese, or Chinese if you will.

A youthful Oriental, without specific instruction, thinks nothing of setting off out of the nursery window half a dozen paper birds, of varied plumage, with strings attached to them, some of them contrived, maybe, to give voice to chirps like those of chicken cocks and other fowls before the breeze.

Of course, the kite itself is a Chinese invention, and probably the same is true of the top. Any way it was a gentleman of Japan who first conceived the idea of a nest of tops that should all fly out and spin when the papa top was set a-going, and similarly it has been with all sorts of other implements for adolescent entertainment.—San Francisco Chronicle.

A DISGUSTED PUPIL.

One Lady Who Will Not Play Progressive Euchre This Season.

A progressive euchre craze had broken out in the neighborhood in which the Baxters lived, and Mrs. Baxter, who did not know an ace from a three-spot, concluded that she must learn the game or retire from society. Mr. Baxter undertook to teach her.

"Now, my dear," he said, "it's like this: In euchre we discard every thing below eight and—"

"Eight what?"

"Why, all cards having less than eight spots are thrown out."

"What for?"

"Because they are not needed in euchre. In whist it is different, for you play with all the cards."

"I should think you'd need all of them in euchre the same as in whist."

"Well, you don't. Now, after the cards are shuffled we cut for deal."

"Do what?

"Cut for deal."

"What's that?"

"Why, we see who shall deal out the cards."

"Oh, mercy, I don't want to deal them; you can every time if you want to."

"But there is often a great advantage in having the deal."

"Oh, there is?"

"Yes, indeed. I'll explain that later on. Now, let's cut. The highest card counts—aha! I get the deal."

"Why, how's that? My card has ten spots on it and yours has only one."

"Yes, but mine is the ace."

"The what?"

"The ace."

"Well, what if it is? You're trying to cheat, sir. You can't make me believe that one is more than ten."

"But I tell you that this is the ace."

"I don't care if it is. Ten spots are more than one. You just the same as said so."

"No, I didn't."

"You did. But I don't care. Cheat if you're small enough to take advantage of a beginner."

"I'm not cheating, as you'll understand when you come to know the value of the cards better. Now, I dealt out five cards to each of us, first two at a time and then three, and—"

"Why don't you deal them all at once?"

"Because it is against the rules."

"I don't see why?"

"Well, it is, and—"

"Well, it's an awful silly rule. When I play I'm going to give each person all his cards and have done with it."

"You'll get tripped up if you do. Now, let's see. What cards have you? Clubs are trumps."

"Clubs are what?"

"Trumps."

"What on earth are trumps?"

"Why, clubs, I said."

"Oh, I know, but what do you mean by trumps?"

"Why, trumps are the winning cards."

"Humph! I know as much now as I did before. I think it's all awfully silly, anyhow."

"Well, let's go on and see what kind of hands we have got. What cards have you?"

"Mercy! I don't know. Here's a hideously ugly old woman with two heads and a heart close to each head."

"That's the queen of hearts. Have you the knave of clubs?"

"The what?"

"The knave of clubs?"

"How should I know? Here's a villainous-looking rascal with a club at each end of the card."

"That's the knave, and the right bower."

"What under the shining sun do you call the 'right bower?'"

"The knave of the card that is the trump is the right bower and the highest card you can hold until you play with the joker."

"The joker?"

"Yes."

"Well, what is the joker?"

"A dummy card."

"That's clear, I must say."

"Well, it's a card without any spots at all on it."

"What's it put in for?"

"Oh, because it is."

"Why?"

"I—I don't know."

"And it's the highest card of all?"

"Yes, it is."

"Now, see here, John Baxter. You said a while ago that a card with one spot on was the highest card, and now you up and say that a card with no spots on is highest, and I just believe you're making fun of me."

"No, I'm not."

"You are, sir."

"Indeed, I'm not."

"You are—anyhow, you can take your old cards and go to Guinea with them! I don't want any thing to do with such a silly, idiotic game! It's all nonsense, anyhow. Bah!"—Detroit Free Press.

Witchery of Candle-Light.

There are so many women who have passed their first youth who appear at the balls in New York and receive the devoted attention of men for whom they must entertain a most grandmotherly interest, that the question of light has become a most important one, so these foxy caterers to the female complexion have taken a leaf out of French books and lighted their rooms with candles, the silver candelabra being set in the walls so that the light falls from the side, not from above, while pretty little fluted petticoats of rose silk shade the colored candles. A side light, especially if it is rose-tinted, takes ten years from a woman's age. No wonder we are in favor of abolishing the deadly electric lamps, and the flaming gas, if wax candles are such thieves of time.—Chicago Journal.

A MAGNETIC YOUTH.

Young Louis Hamburger's Ability to Make Things Stick to His Hands.

Louis, the sixteen-year-old son of Philip Hamburger, is possessed of a mysterious power which is puzzling scientific men. This power enables him to make objects of considerable weight adhere to his finger-tips, contact only being necessary. The young man, who is quite small, has been studying chemistry some time at the Maryland College of Pharmacy, and has shown his parents and friends some astonishing feats and bits of magic. By merely pressing his fully-distended fingers against a heavy cane, he holds it suspended in air for a long time. He is also able, by placing the balls of three fingers against the side of a glass tube, to raise the weight of five pounds attached thereto. He says he has always remarked a peculiar feeling when touching small objects which are wet or greasy, and in order to get the best results in his experiments he must have both the hands and objects dry and very clean. For this purpose he always washed his fingers in alcohol and ether and wipes them and the objects dry.

In the presence of friends he gave an exhibition of his powers. The first experiment was to place a number of pins around the palm of his hands and on the tips of his fingers. On holding the palms vertically the pins are found to drop only after a long time. He next showed his ability to pick up from the table by pressing his dry finger tips against it any highly-polished, smooth body, such as a pencil or a pen. Much more striking, however, was the manner in which a pen held perpendicularly stuck to the ends of his fingers.

Both hands have the same remarkable power, though the right one does the better work. The tips of the fingers, which are more than usually fleshy, are capable of the greatest feats. He touched his fingers against a glass tube three-quarters of an an inch in diameter, and they stuck with such force that, as he pulled them away from it one after another, there was a click. The end of the tube thus raised was freighted with a plaster of paris block, and on this were gradually piled leaden weights until five and one-half pounds were reached. This he was able to raise with the open palms.

The young man loses control of his secret force when the objects become damp by perspiration or otherwise, and can only show its action on very smooth bodies. Prof. William Simon, of the Maryland College of Pharmacy, has developed whatever strength and remarkable powers the young man displays from the very smallest beginnings. He has hopes of making him perform yet more wonderful feats. At present he is engaged in experimenting with him in a scientific manner in order to present the case to the public in a technical journal. He has called the attention of a number of medical specialists in this city to the case, and all are at a loss to give an adequate explanation.—Baltimore Letter.

INDIGENT PEASANTS.

The Hard Struggle for Existence Among the Poor People of Tyrol.

The struggle for mere existence with these poor people (the Tyrolese) is a fearful one, something that an American farmer has never even dreamed of. The summer days are so few and so rainy that the hay can be made only by tying the grass around poles to dry, free from the ground, and they may often be seen mowing in the rain, hoping that the sun will come out long enough to partly dry out the grass when cut.

The men, when mowing, generally have on white aprons, looking much like a lot of barbers or waiters pressed into service. This is due, probably, to the fact that the women do the most of the mowing, and when a man has to do it he wishes to look as much like a woman as possible, so as not to be recognized.

Throughout the most of Europe the peasants, or farmers, live in villages, and go every morning and evening from two to four miles to their land and back, at a great loss of time and thought.

It is a rare thing to see separate houses in the country. In Tyrol and Switzerland the houses are more scattered, and one may often see houses perched so far up on the mountain side that it would seem impossible to get to them, and frequently a hamlet of a dozen or twenty houses will be found lying up almost in the clouds, nearly at the timber line in the most unexpected places. —Cor. Chicago Journal.

The Negroes of Trinidad.

The negroes of the Windward Islands are disposed to be the most unconscionable set of scoundrels on earth They would steal a ship if they could carry it off, but their inventive genius is of so low an order that it vanishes in the presence of such a huge undertaking as the successful removal of a thousand tons of booty. They are pilferers. When a vessel arrives at a Caribbean port they surround it with their fleet of boats and swarm over the decks and cabins, appropriating every thing they can lay their hands on. It requires about half the crew to watch them. They have been known to steal part of a ship's rigging in broad day-light. They stole a piece of salt pork from my hook while I was fishing for sharks at Trinidad. I believed that a shovel-nosed monster had given me a bite and was encouraged to bait the hook again and sit up all night in the hope of catching him. The same trick was tried on the captain of a British bark who fished with a harpoon, and the result was an islander on board with a piece of steel and a frightful wound in his thigh.—Victor Smith, in Chautauquan.

THE DANGEROUS MODISTE.

How Many a Good Woman Wrecks Her Peace of Mind.

Talk about the dangers of the amateur stage, of drink or of cigarette-smoking—they are as nothing compared to the wickedness of the first-class dress-maker. You are a nice-looking little woman, with a pretty figure which Tom has always liked to see well dressed, and he thinks that if any woman does understand the art of gowning it is you. All your long life you have bought your materials at a first-class shop, taken them to a fairly good dress-maker, paid a reasonable price for the making, suggested to the modiste a frill here, a puff there, an artistic effect some place else, and when you wore the frock it was with an easy conscience and a happy heart which added to your good looks.

Some day you enter the parlor of Serpent, Cash & Co.; suddenly your pretty gown has a second-rate look. Mrs. Serpent admires your figure; Mrs. Cash moans how unfortunate it is that you are not dressed properly, and the Company sits behind the desk and grins, knowing what the outcome will be. You see a wondrous gown, just from Paris, which is certain to suit you. You are induced to try it on, and then you hear the price. You shudder at it. You say you can not get it; but, oh! you do look so handsome in it. You know Tom can not afford that money; you know that usually you get three frocks for that amount; but the style is so good, and the voice of the charmer is listened to. You go out of that house with the knowledge that you are going to get that frock, for you have been fitted for it, and you are the most miserable slave in the world.

Mrs. Cash has told you that you can pay twenty-five or fifty dollars at a time on your bill, and get every thing you want there. Well, you begin by paying your twenty-five or fifty dollars; you get more and more new clothes, the bill does not come in for a year, and when it does, you gasp with terror. Coats were sold to you that you were told would cost nothing—and nothing, to Serpent, Cash & Co., means any thing from one hundred and fifty to three hundred and fifty dollars. Still, you think that you can raise a few hundred dollars, and that Tom may give you a little extra money without your telling him what it is for, and then you chirp up and remember that Mrs. Cash said you could pay a little at a time, and, after all, it was just the bill coming in. Poor little wretch! You have a feeling at your heart all the time now as if you were a thief, and within a week you get an insolent note from Mrs. Serpent suggesting that you remit at once.—San Francisco Argonaut.

WIGWAM ROMANCE.

The Modern Red Man a Disappointment to Sentimentalists.

In these times we are but little disposed to associate any thing either like romance or danger with the subdued and poverty-stricken remnants of the Indian race. Now and then, indeed, we have met with a newly-arrived European to whom the Indian of the wigwam is still the fierce and noble savage of Cooper and the other romancists of red life and character.

Such sentimentalists are usually much disappointed on being for the first time introduced to the modern wigwam. No scalps stretched upon hoops, and hung out in the sun to dry, are there to arouse their sensations. The squaw of the establishment has her feet incased, just as likely as not, in varnished Balmoral boots. If her lord and master is not out in the bush, snaring rabbits, or cutting switches for the manufacture of baskets, he is probably lying somewhere about the place in a limp heap, performing a wild and irregular war-song through his nose, under the influence of his real idol, the whisky-bottle.

The European having read of Indian massacres away in the Northwest, is naturally puzzled and uneasy at the mild form in which the aboriginal is here presented to him. He observes that the papoose of tender years is as importunate for money as any small white mendicant of the city pavements; also that he knows a bad copper from a good one when he sees it, and has a sound opinion generally on the subject of currency; and the disappointed European goes his way, perfectly convinced that there never could have been any romance really connected with Indian character, and that, as for the modern red man, he has no more bite left in him than a rattlesnake deprived of its fangs.

As a general thing, all this is true enough when predicted of the miserable remnants of Indian tribes that still haunt the borders of our great lakes and rivers. Nevertheless, they yet have a romance of their own, which comes to light only now and then, and after much close observation and intercourse with them. The poorest wigwam, like the lordly castle, has its traditions; and the further from the haunts of civilization the wigwam is situated, the more thrilling are its legends.—N. Y. Ledger.

Told of a Successful Novel.

I know of an instance where a singularly good and original plot was found in a story written with a grammatical error in almost every line. The author was advised that her manuscript contained the material for a good story, but it would have to be rewritten. She consented, and the manuscript was placed in the hands of a competent writer. When the book appeared the author scarcely recognized her work. The plot was there, but nothing more. As the "reader" predicted, the story, as rewritten, proved a success. To-day it is one of the best known novels in the literary world, and the author, whose name appears on the title page, receives all the credit, while the real author contents himself with the knowledge that his bank account is $250 larger by the work. The truth will perhaps never be known; but I often wonder when I see the title-page author receiving the congratulations of her friends at the success of her book, if her conscience ever pricks her. —Buffalo Courier.

"OVER THE TEA-CUPS."

Thoughts on Old Age by the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table.

I am afraid that old people found life rather a dull business in the time of King David and his rich old subject and friend, Barzillai, who, poor man, could not have told a teal from a canvas-back, nor enjoyed a symphony concert, if they had had those luxuries in his day. There were no pleasant firesides, for there were no chimneys. There were no daily newspapers for the old man to read, and he could not read them if there were, with his dim eyes, nor hear them read, very probably, with his dulled ears. There was no tobacco, a soothing drug, which in its various forms is a great solace to many old men and to some old women—Carlyle and his mother used to smoke their pipes together, you remember.

Old age is infinitely more cheerful, for intelligent people at least, than it was two or three thousand years ago. It is our duty, so far as we can, to keep it so. There will always be enough about it that is solemn, and more than enough, alas! that is saddening. But how much there is in our times to lighten its burdens! If they that look out at the windows be darkened, the optician is happy to supply them with eye-glasses for use before the public, and spectacles for their hours of privacy. If the grinders cease because they are few, they can be made many again by a third dentition, which brings no toothache in its train. By temperance and good habits of life, proper clothing, well-warmed, well-drained and well-ventilated dwellings, and sufficient, not too much exercise, the old man of our time may keep his muscular strength in very good condition. I doubt if Mr. Gladstone, who is fast nearing his eightieth birthday, would boast, in the style of Caleb, that he was as good a man with his axe as he was when he was forty, but I would back him—if the match were possible—for a hundred shekels, against that over-confident old Israelite, to cut down and chop up a cedar of Lebanon. I know a most excellent clergyman, not far from my own time of life, whom I would pit against any old Hebrew rabbi or Greek philosopher of his years and weight, if they could return to the flesh, to run a quarter of a mile on a good, level track.

We must not make too much of such exceptional cases of prolonged activity. I often reproached my dear friend and classmate, James Freeman Clarke, that his ceaseless labors made it impossible for his coevals to enjoy the luxury of that repose which their years demanded. A wise old man, the late Dr. James Walker, president of Harvard University, said that the great privilege of old age was the getting rid of responsibilities. These hard-working veterans will not let one get rid of them until he drops in his harness, and so gets rid of them and his life together. How often has many a tired old man envied the superannuated family cat, stretched upon the rug before the fire, letting the genial warmth tranquilly diffuse itself through all her internal arrangements! No more watching for mice in dark, damp cellars, no more awaiting the savage gray rat at the mouth of his den, no more scurrying up trees and lamp-posts to avoid the neighbor's cur who wishes to make her acquaintance! It is very grand to "die in harness," but it is very pleasant to have the tight straps unbuckled and the heavy collar lifted from the neck and shoulders.—Oliver Wendell Holmes, in Atlantic.

A FRENCH ROMANCE.

The History of an Annuity That Reads Like a Mediæval Legend.

Quite a romance in real life has been related by the Abbe Martin, the parish priest of Audes, in the Department of the Allier, who was recently robbed of £2,400. The priest was lying asleep in his room, when he suddenly felt himself seized by a strong hand and gagged, while the point of a sharp instrument was pressed against his breast. A voice said to him, 'If you stir you are a dead man!" The Abbe lay still, and, after a short time, the midnight marauders went away. He then rose, and found that his money was gone, and that the robbers had also been in his brother's room. This is the tragedy part of the story, but the real romance comes in about the money, which was the instalment of an annuity enjoyed by the priest since the year 1887. The history of this annuity reads like a mediæval legend. Once upon a time, several years ago, as the Abbe told the officer of gendarmes at Herisson, he was accosted outside his church by a miserable man in rags, who said he belonged to a great and wealthy family, which he had utterly dishonored by his sentence to penal servitude for grievous offences against the law. The unknown begged of the Abbe to get him into a monastery, where he could live and die in complete obscurity, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot." Abbe Martin took pity on him, and found him a place as lay-brother in a Spanish monastery. A few years after that the priest received a letter from a notary informing him that he had been appointed the universal legatee and executor of a person who died in a monastic establishment in Spain, and whose property in France was worth several millions of francs. The Abbe, armed with his papers, went off to the family of the deceased monk, whose brother, believing him to have died in the hulks, had inherited all the paternal property. By an amicable arrangement the Abbe cheerfully surrendered his rights, and upon the condition of never disclosing the name of the family of the defunct monk, he was supplied with a handsome annuity of £2,400. Of this fact the robbers who broke into his room were evidently aware. The marauders have not yet been arrested.—London Daily Telegraph's Paris Correspondence.

"Pray, my lord," queried a gentleman of a judge, "what is the difference between common law and equity?" "Very little in the end," responded his lordship. "At common law you are more quickly disposed of. The former is a bullet which is instantaneously and charmingly effective; the latter an angler's hook, which plays with the victim before it kills him. Common law is prussic acid: equity is laudanum." N. Y. Ledger.

County Official Paper.

During the past few years there have been many rumors of the extension of the Carson and Colorado Railroad. The San Francisco Bulletin of recent date contained the following:

H. M. Yerington, President of the Carson and Colorado Railroad, says his company will commence a southern extension this spring, but further than this he refuses at present to say. Several months ago, hewever, Mr. Yerington was more communicative and said his company intended to extend the road due south from its present terminus at Keeler, on Owens Lake, this State, for a distance of some fifty miles, the object being to connect with some new road that would enter the State southwesterly in the direction of or toward Mojave. He intimated strongly that it would be the Union Pacific his road would connect with. The supposition now is, however, that the Carson and Colorado intends to extend its road south of Owens Lake independent of what the Union Pacific may do.

The people of Owens Valley have long looked forward hopefully for the extension of this road in the belief that it would afford them access to a market for their produce. But it will be well for them to consider the following facts: In Los Angeles, where they expect to find this market, oats, barley, corn and wheat are cheaper than in Inyo county. The same is true of butter, eggs, cheese, poultry of all kinds, potatoes and all kinds of vegetables. Hay is higher in price there than here, but with the cost of freight added it is doubtful whether that article could be shipped from Owens Valley and sold for a price that would leave any profit to the producers. Our farmers complain that they find great difficulty in making ends meet now. It will not help them any to get access to a market where produce is sold cheaper than they allege it costs them to raise it. The methods of farming pursued in Owens Valley must be improved so that produce can be raised much cheaper than at present, or the extension of the railroad will do our farmers no good. If the soil, climate and conditions are such as to make a great reduction in the cost of production impossible then no amount of railroad facility will better our condition. The certainty of finding a market at some price for large quantities of certain kinds of produce might lead to changes in methods of farming that would enable our farmers to ship to Los Angeles. At present there is no outside market, and consequently no inducement to increase production. It is certain that Owens Valley can produce unlimited quantities of most excellent apples, and that Los Angeles would afford a market for this fruit. But here again comes the fact that in order to have that market apples would have to be sold at half, or even one-third of the price demanded at home. With large orchards this great reduction could be made, and then the producers would have large profits, far greater than they ever realized from grain or other crops even in the most prosperous times. It is certain that a railroad will soon be extended from Salt Lake to Los Angeles; our farmers would do well, therefore, to inform themselves of the prices for farm produce in Utah, as they will have to compete with that country in Los Angeles if the C. and C. road shall be extended. At present there is no market for beef cattle in Inyo county beyond the very small quantity needed for home consumption and in consequence cattle are worth but little and our stockmen for several years past have earned next to nothing. The extension of the railroad would open up a market for beef, and we could send Los Angeles good beef, instead of the rubbish it is now compelled to eat. No one need expect that the extension of the railroad, come when it may, will bring in a sudden flood of money upon us. But it may bring opportunities that wise men will take advantage of to improve their fortunes, while drones and dullards are left in the lurch, just as they always are. Perhaps the greatest good the extension of the railroad will do us will be bringing us into closer contact with a great center of mental and business activity than we ever can have without it. At present our country is a land where it is always afternoon. With easy access to a great city will come the morning of a more active and life-like day.

An attempt to encourage the introduction of coolie labor in Senegal was voted down by the French Cononial Congress. Neither the natives nor Europeans like them.

The people of Louisville are entitled to high praise for the courage with which they bear the terrible calamity that has fallen upon them. The loss of life and property, however, is not so great as was at first feared. It is now reported that not more than one hundred lives were lost and the destruction of property is placed at two millions of dollars. The rich men of the city came nobly to the relief of the poor people who were injured and the city authorities gave notice that they were amply able to care for all their people who need help. This does much honor to Louisville. The loss of life in other parts of Kentucky outside of Louisville is estimated at one hundred and fifty persons. The destruction caused by the vast flood in the Mississippi extends over several States and is enormous.

In 1873 silver was demonetized by a piece of villany not differing morally from swindling or forgery. The object of this crime was to rob every workingman, farmer, mechanic, or common laborer, and every man of small means in the United States. The opposition to the restoration of silver to its proper use as a coin is made by those who want to enjoy the fruits of the original crime. The friends of silver should not let the argument be covered up in quibbles and subtleties; they should steadily keep the fact in full view of everybody that the Act of 1873 was a crime that escaped without notice at the time, and insist that the wrong be righted and the robbery stopped as quickly as possible.

Since the demonetization of silver in 1873 farm products of all kinds have depreciated in value from one-fourth to one-third, and in many cases even more. The loss to the farmers in the years since then is counted, not by millions, or tens of millions, but by hundreds of millions. The result of that crime has been the most gigantic system of robbery ever known on earth; and the robbery continues, and will continue, until silver shall be restored to its proper place as a coin metal.

The Tory party in the English Parliament are now trying to have a bill passed authorizing the Government to loan money at low rates of interest to Irish tenant farmers for the purpose of buying out the landlords. The Government is to be secured by mortgage on the land. This is in effect the same as the suggestion of Senator Stanford for the Government loaning money to the farmers of the United States.

The Child and "A Gone Sucker."

A Connecticut child often says something that is bright. Here is a case in point, little Johnny ran into the house one day recently and asked his mother with great eagerness, "Ma, what is a gone sucker?"

"Why, Johnny, what do you mean?" said his astonished parent.

"Tell me, ma, quick, what is a gone sucker?" persisted the young seeker after light.

"Well, it's a very bad man," was the best answer his mother could give him on the spur of the moment. It satisfied the lad, and he ran out and continued his play. At night he was tired and cross, and when his bedtime came he "cut up" after the manner of the youngsters who are bound to be mischievous. A little mild correction was administered, he was undressed, and told to say his prayers.

"I can't," said Johnny.

"But you must," said his mother.

Johnny, bearing in mind the correction already administered, and knowing that rebellion would be useless, dropped down on his knees and said:

"Oh, Lord, I am a gone sucker! Amen."

His parents are of the Methodist persuasion, and Johnny's testimony was short and to the point, as the old fashioned Methodists used to require in the days long past.—Ansonia (Conn.) Cor. New York Sun.

When Ada Rehan Was Ada Crehan.

The connection between the Vokes family and that dashing pet of the Daly company, Ada Rehan, is probably unknown in Boston. In dramatic circles the report has been current that Miss Rehan was born under the name of Crehan, but that the invincible corrector of poor writers' poor writing, the proof reader, decided upon a rechristening when the young girl made her professional debut, and, therefore, put forth the debutante's name as Ada C. Rehan, whereat Mrs. John Drew advised the youthful actress to accept the fates and the favorable criticism given "Miss Rehan," and live and die under the chance acquired name. The story is an interesting bit of gossip, all true if only it had a general negative before it. Miss Rehan was born a Crehan, that is authentic, but she also made her debut a Crehan, for a play bill of the Arch Street theatre, Philadelphia, under date of 1872, shows Ada Crehan playing in the farce, "Simpson & Co.," which served as a prelude to the Vokes Family's "Fun in a Fog."—Boston Journal.

Packages for Mailing Coin In.

An invention that is being used out west for sending coin through the mails consists of a piece of pasteboard about the size of an envelope. In it are holes the size of a silver quarter, a half dollar and a dollar, with red paper seals ready to paste across each slot. A coin can be put in and sealed, inclosed in an envelope, and sent through the mails in safety. If some shrewd inventor will put those things on the market with slots to make any desired amount, the government's postal note business will take a drop.—New York Graphic.

New Guinea Head Hunters.

The bad habit some savages have of cutting off the heads of any strangers who fall in their way simply because heads are required to adorn their sacred houses or to serve in the dedicatory exercises of their war canoes, has tragically ended the careers of a number of white men during the past year. The latest news from New Guinea is that Mr. Armstrong, an Englishman, was recently lured to one of the coast islands, where he was decapitated and his head sent to the coast chiefs as proof that the islanders were attending to business. About a year ago a brave in one of the wild tribes on the Indian frontier was not permitted to wed the maiden of his choice, because the relatives were of the opinion that he had not acquired a sufficient number of heads to demonstrate his prowess. It was agreed that when he could show two more heads he might have the girl, and so he sallied forth to win reputation and a bride.

It happened that the first strangers the brave and his party encountered were Lieut. Stewart, of the British army, and his small escort, who were led into an ambush and slaughtered and their heads taken back in triumph to the village. This was the cap sheaf of a series of head hunting outrages, and the brave had not long enjoyed his honeymoon before an Indian expedition fell upon the tribe and gave it some new views on the ethics of head hunting. This favorite pastime has flourished greatly in Borneo, but it is now in a bad way in the British part of that island, where the penalty of death is visited upon every head hunter who is unlucky enough to be caught. A while ago the British authorities, in settling a dispute between two tribes, found that one village persisted in head hunting because the other fellows had three heads advantage of them. The accounts were balanced by a small supply of trade goods, and the rival head hunters promised thereafter to live in amity.—

John Dodge of Lone Pine was in town to-day.

S. G. Sneden has been reappointed a Notary Public.

W. T. Grant of Olancha has been in town during the week.

Assessor Chalfant has been quite sick at his home at Bishop.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Meysan got home yesterday from Los Angeles.

R. W. Scott of Bishop has sued Mollie Scott for a divorce, alleging desertion.

G. Sanger and S. G. Gregg were down from Big Pine at the beginning of the week.

Regular meeting of Inyo Lodge No. 221 F. & A. M. at Independence to-morrow evening.

W. R. Tibbitts came down from Big Pine on Tuesday and remained in town a couple of days.

A fine saddle horse belonging to Manuel Diaz was burned in the fire at Lone Pine last Monday.

Mr. Mike Lasky returned to Lone Pine last Monday after an absence of two years at San Francisco.

Transfers from Belshaw, Judson and the V. Beaudry estate of the Darwin water works and springs to P. Reddy have been recorded.

A leading engineer of the Union Pacific road is given as authority for the statement that no railroad building will be done south of Pioche this year.

Inyo Lodge No. 301 I. O. O. F. has elected P. H. Mack a representative to the Grand Lodge, which convenes in San Francisco on May 12th.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Symmes arrived home on Monday evening from Stockton. Mr. Symmes is a good deal improved in health since he went from home but is yet much crippled.

Mr. W. Walker of Olancha was very sick of late. Dr. I. J. Woodin went to his place and stayed several days, returning home last Tuesday. "Pap" is now getting better.

Next Sunday being Easter the choir at Independence will have a special service of song. Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will take for his subject, "The Resurrection of Christ."

Last Monday at Seven Mile Canyon, near Virginia City, John Taylor shot and instantly killed G. W. Prentice. The latter threatened to kill Taylor on sight and was shot in the act of drawing his gun. Taylor gave himself up.

A real mining boom is reported at Pioche. In five years nineteen millions of dollars were taken out of the mines. Recently the property has passed into other hands and the new owners are reopening the mines with as good prospects of rich strikes as in the booming times of the camp.

Last Monday morning twelve men left Big Pine to go to work on the new road to the Sylvania mines. The road will be pushed through as rapidly as possible. Mr. A. A. Riddle is boss of the job. As soon as the road is open for travel machinery and material for a furnace will be hauled by rail to Alvord and from there by teams to the mines.

Excellent Views.

Miss Teresa Walker of Olancha has a set of photographic pictures of scenes in the Menache and Mount Whitney regions of the Sierra Nevada Mountains that give a better idea of the character of that scenery that any other views yet taken. Mr. W. E. Houghton of Bakersfield took the views last summer. Miss Walker very kindly sent her collection to the INDEPENDENT last week and they have been sent to a number of people here who are familiar with the scenes represented and all are warm in their praise of the pictures. Every visitor to Olancha should ask to see these fine views; Miss Walker will take pleasure in showing them.

Unreasonable.

A general feeling prevails that the calling of such a great number of witnesses to Bakersfield in the Elliott case is done only through a spirit of revenge on the part of Elliott and his counsel. By far the larger part of the people subpœnaed know nothing about the case more than common rumor. Most of the men subpœnaed are farmers and these feel deeply wronged by being forced to loose about a month of their busiest time of the whole year. The time of the Court will be wasted in calling and examining so many people who cannot testify to a single material fact in the case, and to drag such people so far away and so uselessly is little short of an outrage.

Inyo Marble Quarries.

Special Correspondence.

KEELER, March 31, 1890.

ED. INDEPENDENT: Dear Sir:—In conversing with many people of this valley I learn that they have never been properly informed in regard to the marble of the Inyo range. I therefore believe it would not be out of place for me to say a word in regard to it, particularly of that quarried by the Inyo Marble Company.

It must be admitted that this deposit is inexhaustible. It appears in many varieties, and all kinds of this marble are of the very best quality. A more perfect crystallization has never come to my notice, and I do not believe it to be known of any marble in the world. I admit this marble to be very hard, but this proves its durability and strength. It takes a quick and lasting polish, which more than counterbalances the objection of its being hard and slow to cut. Vermont and Italian marbles are more easily worked, but no marble can be so easily polished as the Inyo marble, and it holds its polish nearly, if not quite, as long as granite, and its great strength fits it for any purpose for which granite is used. This marble can be rubbed down with iron shot without pitting it deeply, giving it a great advantage over any other marble known. Italian and Vermont marble receives deep sand-pits when sand is used to cut it down to a surface and much more time and labor are required to grit out the sand-pits from those soft marbles than is required to polish the Inyo marble from the start. Many people have been led to believe that the marble could not be obtained in blocks or slabs sufficiently large to fill orders of large dimensions. I have no doubt but they got that impression from the Eighth Annual Report of the State Mineralogist, for 1888, page 229, which makes the following statement:

"The Inyo marble quarries are situated at the very foot of the Inyo Mountains, about five miles northeasterly from Keeler and seven and a half miles southeasterly from the railroad station at Lone Pine.

The dolomite from these quarries is generally fine grained and quite hard; it takes a good polish and is a durable and handsome stone. The quarry, however, is full of seams and cracks which run in all directions and it is difficult to get out blocks which are perfectly sound of more than two or three tons in weight."

The above statement was made by Mr. W. A. Goodyear and was undoubtedly made in good faith; but it is very evident that the writer was not a practical marble quarryman, and as the quarry at that time had not been opened to a depth for an inexperienced man to determine whether it was sound or not it was a very natural mistake. It is true that the cracks on the surface of this ledge run in many directions and would warrant the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Goodyear at that time. I am forced to admit that Mr. Goodyear is a gentleman of ability, and I believe a fair man, as that gentleman was with me on the 27th inst. and is perfectly willing to correct the mistake in his former report. He is fully convinced that these quarries will produce any sized blocks, sound and handsome, required by the market. He also saw some very fine blocks of pure white marble in our yard that will weigh from three to ten tons each. I also convinced him that the cracks he saw so thick on the surface do not go down in the marble far enough to render it unsound at any reasonable depth.

It is evident that the marble deposit in Owens Valley is of immense value and will in a very short space of time prove a business far exceeding any other industry in this valley. The business should, however, be encouraged by the people of the county, who will be greatly benefited by the success of the Marble Company. I know of no reason why this marble should not drive all other marble from the Coast and be a pride to the people of Owens Valley.

Respectfully,
M. V. B. BRONSON.

Mr. W. A. Goodyear, Geologist for the State Mining Bureau, made a visit to Keeler and the marble quarry last week. Mr. Goodyear visited the quarry two years ago and made a report upon it as it then appeared. He now asks the INDEPENDENT to publish the fact that since his last visit large ledges of very beautiful marble have been uncovered and that blocks of any size that may be wanted can be taken out, entirely free from crack or blemish of any kind. He thinks the marble is of the finest quality and the quarry practically inexhaustible. Mr. Goodyear went north last Saturday on his way to San Francisco.

The Sylvania Mines.

Mr. S. G. Gregg made a visit to the Sylvania mines recently. He reports having gone down a shaft to a depth of eighty feet. This shaft is in solid ore all the way and the vein varies from six to ten feet and even more in thickness. The ore carries three ounces in gold per ton, sixty ounces silver and about sixty percent. lead. This makes the ore worth about one hundred and sixty dollars per ton. Mr. Gregg says the vein has not been explored beyond the shaft on either side along the ledge. On the surface the ledge is easily traced at least six hundred feet. In the bottom of the shaft the vein appeared to continue without change. Mr. Gregg thinks the property is very valuable. This is one of the claims recently bought by Andy Fyle and others from a prospector named Kincaid. An adjoining claim belonging to Boircher and son is more extensively prospected than the above. Mr. Gregg did not examine the mine but he says Mr. Fyle has it bonded and told him it was the better mine of the two. Mr. Fyle will put up a thirty-ton smelting furnace some time this Spring. Mr. Gregg visited Sylvania as one of a committee appointed from Big Pine to lay out a new road from the railroad to the mines. The road will be forty-five miles long and will be put through without loss of time.

Good News if True.

Rumor says that Mr. Archie Farrington has secured from the Eureka Ditch company the use of the water power at Eclipse. Mr. Farrington was a principal owner in the Reno Reduction works, recently destroyed by fire, and the water power was secured with the intention to build works at Eclipse. That the short line of railroad in Mono county is to be extended to Benton, thus securing an abundant supply of timber for fuel and all other purposes. If rumor is correct in these reports Inyo county will be greatly benefited by the proposed improvements.

Livery Stable Burned.

Last Monday morning about nine o'clock the livery stable of J. G. Dodge of Lone Pine caught fire and was destroyed. Seven horses, a lot of harness, saddles, hay, grain and other material was lost. The fire is reported to have started from some unknown cause. A strong breeze was blowing and the spark was fanned into a fierce flame in an instant. Lone Pine has a good fire hose and plenty of water and by this means kept the fire from spreading, otherwise the town would have been destroyed. Mr. Dodge had no insurance and his loss is heavy.

Saline Valley Borax Deposits.

The article published last week on the borax deposits in Saline Valley contained some errors in the numbers of townships. Those errors have been corrected and the article is republished as follows:

SALINE VALLEY, March 26th.

ED. INDEPENDENT: The borax deposits in Saline Valley extend over a portion of four townships, viz.: Townships, No. 14 S. R. 39 E., No. 14 S. R. 38 E. No. 13 S. R. 38 E. and No. 13 S. R. 39 E., M. D. M. The principal portion of the borax deposit is in the northwest part of township No. 14 S. R. 39 E. and the northeast portion of Tp. 14 S. R. 38 E. The marsh portion of the valley has an area of 25 to 30 square miles. The salt portion of the deposit is at the southwest border of the valley and has an area of two to three square miles. This is the lowest point in the valley, the altitude being about 1,100 feet. The borax belt and a soda mineral belt cross each other in the valley forming the combination known as borate of soda. The course of these belts, as near as I can determine, is; soda, north 20° east; borax, north, 20° west. The deposits of borate of soda found on the west side of the marsh are heavy and rich, but not regularly distributed over the surface. This indicates that the deposits have been formed by water running in a number of channels, or "washes," from the northeast to the southwest side. The deposit on the east side of the marsh extends for a distance of four to five miles in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction and is rich in borax and very evenly distributed. When the borax found on the surface is removed another deposit speedily forms which seems, judging from ordinary tests, to be as rich as the original deposits. At the northeast edge of the marsh there rises out of the bedrock a number of springs the water of which is strongly impregnated with boracic acid. The water from all these springs quickly sinks into the marsh, the flow being strongest from October till April of each year. The belts of borax and soda already spoken of in their course southerly are separated; at the extreme southeast side of the valley and on that side of the marsh is found a deposit of borate of lime, more commonly called "cotton-ball." The supply of wood and water in the valley is abundant. In my judgment there is not a place in the United States where borax can be got at so small a cost as in Saline Valley. Messrs. Conn & Trudo have made a fairly good road from their works in Saline Valley to Alvord Station on the C. & C. Railroad. This is something for which other locators should not only be thankful, but should be willing to pay a fair proportion of the cost, and by so doing the road could be put in much better condition than it now is. The length of the road is forty-five miles.

WEINSTOCK & LUBIN:

The principle that we go on.

WE go on the principle that the better we are able to please our customers the faster the business will grow. It is already the largest of its kind on the Coast, employing from two hundred and fifty to three hundred and twenty-five people.

There are other things besides honest dealing which have made the business grow. The goods come direct from the factories and leading wholesalers of Europe and America, and that helps. Goods are sold for cash only, and that helps. There is but one price; all customers are treated alike; people have learned to know this, and that helps. We are always willing to take back what does not suit (it's a sort of guarantee of our faith in whatever we sell), and if mistakes are made are eager to correct them at any expense of time or money; people like such methods, and that helps.

This store is not perfect by any means, but it is a great deal better store than it was last year, or the years before that; and we trust that it will be better next year than it is this.

Send for large Illustrated Catalogue (free) giving full information about our goods and prices, with directions how to order; also samples of goods by the yard.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

CHAPTER XVII.

"WHAT SOME HAVE FOUND SO SWEET."

Meanwhile, things at the castle were going very pleasantly for everybody. The squire was as happy in attending to the various details connected with the transfer of the mortgages as though he had been lending thirty thousand pounds instead of borrowing it. The great George was happy in the unaccustomed flow of borrowed cash, that enabled him to treat Janter with a lofty scorn not unmingled with pity, which was as balm to his harassed soul, and also to transact an enormous amount of business in his own peculiar way with men up trees and otherwise, for had he not to stock the Moat farm, and was not Michaelmas at hand?

Ida, too, was happy, happier than she had been since her brother's death. Besides, Mr. Edward Cossey was out of the way, and that to Ida was a very great thing, for his presence to her was what a policeman is to a ticket of leave man—a most unpleasant and suggestive sight. She fully realized the meaning and extent of the bargain into which she had entered to save her father and her house, and there lay upon her the deep shadow of evil that was to come. Every time she saw her father bustling about with his business letters and parchments, every time the universal George arrived with an air of melancholy satisfaction and a long list of farming stock and implements he had bought at some neighboring Michaelmas sale, the shadow deepened, and she heard the clanking of her chains. Therefore she was the more thankful for her respite.

Harold Quaritch was happy, too, though in a somewhat restless and peculiar way. Mrs. Jobson, the old lady who attended to his wants at Moleshill, with the help of a gardener and a simple village maid, her niece, who smashed all the crockery, and nearly drove the colonel mad by banging the doors, shifting his papers, and even dusting his trays of Roman coins, actually confided to some friends in the village that she thought the poor dear gentleman was going mad. When questioned on what she based this belief, she replied that he would walk up and down the oak paneled dining room by the hour together, that then, when he got tired of that exercise, whereby, said Mrs. Jobson, he had already worn a groove in the new Turkey carpet, he would take out a "rokey" (foggy) looking bit of a picture, and set it upon a chair and stare at it through his fingers, shaking his head and muttering all the while. Then—further and conclusive proof of a yielding intellect—he would get a half sheet of paper with some writing on it, and put it on the mantelpiece and stare at that. Next he would turn it upside down and stare at it so, then sideways, then all ways, then he would hold it before a looking glass, and stare at the looking glass, and so on. When asked how she knew all this, she confessed that Jane had seen it through the key hole, not once, but often.

Of course, as the practiced and discerning reader will clearly understand, this meant only that when walking and wearing out the carpet the colonel was thinking of Ida; when contemplating the painting she had given him, he was admiring her work and trying to reconcile his admiration with his own conscience and his somewhat peculiar views of art, and that when glaring at the paper he was vainly endeavoring to make head or tail of the message written to his son on the night before his execution by Sir James de la Molle in the reign of Charles I, and confidently believed by Ida to contain a key to the whereabouts of the treasure he was supposed to have secreted.

Of course the tale of this worthy soul, Mrs. Jobson, did not lose in the telling, and when it reached Ida's ears, which it did at last through the medium of George—for in addition to his numberless other functions, George was the sole authorized purveyor of village and country news—it read that Col. Quaritch had gone raving mad.

Ten minutes afterward this raving lunatic arrived at the castle in his dress clothes and his right mind, whereupon Ida promptly repeated her thrilling history, somewhat to the subsequent discomfort of Mrs. Jobson and Jane.

No one, as somebody once said, with equal truth and profundity, knows what a minute may bring forth; much less, therefore, does anybody know what an evening of say two hundred and forty minutes may produce. For instance, Harold Quaritch—though by this time he had gone so far as to freely admit to himself that he was utterly and hopelessly in love with Ida, in love with her with that settled and determined passion which sometimes strikes a man or woman in middle age—certainly did not know that before the evening was out he would have declared his devotion with results that shall be made clear in their decent order. When he put on his dress clothes to come up to dinner he had no more intention of proposing to Ida than he had of not taking them off when he went to bed. His love was deep enough and steady enough, but perhaps it did not possess that wild impetuosity which carries people so far in their youth, sometimes, indeed, a great deal further than their reason approves. It was essentially a middle aged devotion, and bore the same resemblance to the picturesque passion of five-and-twenty that a snow fed torrent does to a navigable river. The one rushes and roars and sweeps away the bridges and devastates happy homes, while the other bears upon its placid breast the Argosies of peace and plenty, and is generally serviceable to the necessities of man. But, for all that, there is something attractive about torrents. There is a grandeur in that first rush of passion which results from the sudden melting of the snows of the heart's purity and faith and high unstained devotion.

But both torrents and navigable rivers are liable to one common fate, they may fall over precipices, and when that happens even the latter cease to be navigable for a space. And that was what was about to happen to our friend the colonel.

To begin with, he had dined well, and whatever ardent twenty-three may think of so gross and material a fact, it is certainly true that if a man is in love before dinner, he is five-and-twenty per cent. more in love after it.

Well, Harold Quaritch had dined, and he had had a pleasant as well as a good dinner. The squire, who of late had been cheerful as a cricket, was in his best form, and told long stories with an infinitesimal point. In anybody else's mouth these stories would have been wearisome to a degree, but there was a gusto, an originality, and a kind of Tudor period flavor about the old gentleman which made his worst and longest story acceptable in any society. The colonel himself, too, had come out in a most unusual way. He had a fund of dry humor in him which he rarely produced, but when he did produce it it was of a most satisfactory order. On this particular night it was all on view, greatly to the satisfaction of Ida, who was a witty as well as a clever woman. And so it came to pass that the dinner was a very pleasant one.

Harold and the squire were still sitting over their wine, and the latter was for the fifth time giving to the former a full and particular account of how his deceased aunt, Mrs. Massey, had been persuaded by a learned antiquarian to convert, or rather restore, Dead Man's Mount into its supposed primitive condition of an ancient British dwelling, and of the extraordinary expression of her face when the bill came in, when suddenly the servant announced that George was waiting to see him.

The old gentleman grumbled a great deal, but finally got up and departed to enjoy himself for the next hour or so in talking about things in general with his retainer, leaving his guest to find his way to the drawing room.

When the colonel reached the room he found Ida seated at the piano, singing. She heard him shut the door, looked round, nodded prettily, and then went on with her singing. He came and sat down on a low chair some two paces from her, placing himself in such a position that he could see her face, which, indeed, he always found a wonderfully pleasant object of contemplation. Ida was playing without music—the only light in the room was that of a low lamp with a red fringe to it. Therefore, he could not see very much, being only with difficulty able to trace the outlines of her features, but if the shadow thus robbed him, it on the other hand lent her a beauty of its own, clothing her face with an atmosphere of wonderful softness which it did not always possess in the glare of day. The colonel indeed (we must remember that he was in love and that it was after dinner) became quite poetical (internally, of course) about it, and in his heart compared her first to St. Cecilia at her organ, and then to the Angel of the Twilight. He had never seen her look so lovely. At her worst she was a handsome and noble looking woman; but now the shadow from without, and though he knew nothing of that, the shadow from her heart within also, aided, may be, by the music's swell, had softened and purified her face till it did indeed look almost like an angel's. It is strong, powerful faces that are capable of the most tenderness, not the soft and pretty ones, and even in a plain person, when such a face is in this way seen, it gathers a peculiar beauty of its own. But Ida was not a plain person, so on the whole it is scarcely to be wondered at that a certain effect was produced upon Harold Quaritch.

Ida, to outward appearance at any rate, all unconscious of what was passing in her admirer's mind, went on singing almost without a break. She had a good memory and a sweet voice, and really liked music for its own sake, so it was no great effort to her to do so.

Presently she came to a song from Tennyson's "Maud," the tender and beautiful words whereof will be familiar to most of the readers of her story. It began:

> Oh, let the solid ground
> Not fail beneath my feet,
> Before my heart has found
> What some have found so sweet.

The song is a lovely one, and it did not suffer from her rendering, and the effect produced upon Harold by it was of a most peculiar nature. All his past life seemed to heave and break beneath the magic of the music and the magic of the singer, as a northern field of ice breaks up beneath the outburst of the summer sun. It broke up, and sunk, and vanished into the depths of his nature, those dread unmeasured depths that roll and murmur in the vastness of each human heart, as the sea rolls beneath its cloak of ice, that roll and murmur here, and set toward a shore of which we have no chart or knowledge. The past was gone, the frozen years had melted, and once more the sweet strong air of youth blew across his heart, and once more there was blue sky above, wherein the angels sailed. Under the influence of that song the barrier of self broke down, and his being went out to meet her being, and all the possibilities of life seemed to breathe afresh.

He sat and listened, and, as he listened, trembled in his agitation, till the sweet echoes of the music died upon the quiet air. They died, and were gathered into the emptiness which receives and records all things, the oath and the prayer, the melody and the scream of agony, the shout of triumph and the wail of woe, and left him broken.

She turned to him, smiling faintly, for the song had moved her also, and he felt that he must speak.

"That is a beautiful song," he said; "sing it again, if you do not mind."

She made no answer, but once more sung:

> "Oh, let the solid ground
> Not fail beneath my feet,
> Before my heart has found
> What some have found so sweet,"

and then suddenly broke off.

"Why are you looking at me?" she said. "I can feel you looking at me, and you make me nervous."

He bent toward her and looked her in the eyes.

"I love you, Ida," he said; "I love you with all my heart"—and he stopped suddenly.

She turned quite pale—even in that light he could see her pallor, and her hands fell heavily on the keys.

The echo of the crashing notes rolled round the room and died slowly away—but still she said nothing.

CHAPTER XVIII.

IN PAWN.

At last Ida spoke, apparently with a great effort.

"It is stifling in here," she said; "let us go out," and she rose, took up a shawl that lay beside her on a chair, and stepped through the French window into the garden. It was a lovely autumn night, and the air was as still as death, with just a touch of frost in it.

Ida threw the shawl over her shoulders, and followed by Harold walked on through the garden, till she came to the edge of the moat, where there was a seat. Here she sat down and fixed her eyes upon the hoary battlements of the gateway, now clad in a solemn robe of moonlight.

Harold looked at her and felt that if he had anything to say the time had come for him to say it, and that she had brought him there in order that she might be able to listen undisturbed. So he began again, and told her that he loved her dearly. "I am some seventeen years older than you," he went on, "and I suppose that the most active part of my life lies in the past; and I don't know if, putting other things aside, you would care to marry so old a man, especially as I am not rich. Indeed, I feel it presumptuous on my part, seeing what you are and what I am, to ask you to do so. And yet, Ida, I believe if you could care for me that, with God's blessing, we should be very happy together. I have led a lonely life, and have had little to do with women—once, many years ago, I was engaged, and the matter ended painfully, and that is all. But ever since I first saw your face in the drift five years and more ago, it has haunted me and been with me, and then I came to live here and I have learned to love you, heaven only knows how much, and I should be ashamed to try to put it into words, for they would sound foolish. All my life is wrapped up in you, and I feel as though, should you see me no more, I should never be a happy man again," and he paused and looked anxiously at her face, which was set and drawn as though with pain.

"I cannot say 'yes,' Col. Quaritch," she answered, at length, in a tone that puzzled him, it was so tender and so unfitted to the words.

"I suppose," he stammered, "I suppose that you do not care for me? Of course, I have no right to expect that you would."

"As I have said that I cannot say 'yes,' Col. Quaritch, do you not think that I had better leave that question unanswered?" she replied, in the same soft notes which seemed to draw the heart out of him.

"I do not understand," he went on. "Why?"

"Why?" she broke in, with a bitter little laugh, "shall I tell you why? Because I am in pawn. Look," she went on, pointing to the stately towers and the broad lands beyond, "you see this place, I am security for it, I myself in my own person. Had it not been for me it would have been sold over our heads after having descended in our family for all these centuries, put upon the market and sold for what it would fetch, and my old father would have been turned out to die, for it would have killed him. So you see I did what unfortunate women have often been driven to do, I sold myself body and soul, and I got a good price too—thirty thousand pounds!" and suddenly she burst into a flood of tears and began to sob as though her heart would break.

For a moment Harold Quaritch looked on bewildered, not in the least understanding what Ida meant, and then he followed the impulse common to mankind in similar circumstances and took her in his arms. She did not resent the movement, indeed, she scarcely seemed to notice it, though, to tell the truth, for a moment or two, which to the colonel seemed the happiest of his life, her head rested on his shoulder.

Almost instantly, however, she raised it, freed herself from his embrace and ceased weeping.

"As I have told you so much," she said, "I suppose that I had better tell you everything. I know that whatever the temptation," and she laid great stress upon the words, "under any conceivable circumstances—indeed, even if you believed that you were serving me in so doing—I can rely upon you never to reveal to anybody, and above all to my father, what I now tell you," and she paused and looked up at him with eyes in which the tears still swam.

"Of course you can rely upon me," he said.

"Very well. I am sure that I shall never have to reproach you with the words. I will tell you. I have virtually promised to marry Mr. Edward Cossey, should he at any time be in a position to claim fulfillment of the promise, on condition of his taking up the mortgages on Honham, which he has done."

Harold Quaritch took a step back and looked at her in horrified astonishment.

"What?" he asked.

"Yes, yes," she answered, hastily, putting up her hand as though to shield herself from a blow. "I know what you mean, but do not think too hardly of me if you can help it. It was not for myself. I would rather work for my living with my hands than take a price, for there is no other word for it. It was for my father, and my family too. I could not bear to think of the old place going to the hammer, and I did it all in a minute, without consideration; but," and she set her face, "even as things are, I believe I should do it again, because I think that no woman has a right to destroy her family in order to please herself. If one of the two must go let it be the woman. But don't think hardly of me for it," she added, almost pleadingly, "that is if you can help it."

"I am not thinking of you," he answered grimly. "By Heaven, I honor you for what you have done, for however much I may disagree with the act it is a noble one. I am thinking of the man who could drive such a bargain with any woman. You say that you have promised to marry him should he ever be in a position to claim it. What do you mean by that? As you have told me so much you may as well tell me the rest."

He spoke clearly and with a voice of authority, but his bearing did not seem to jar upon Ida.

"I meant," she answered, humbly, "that I believe—of course I do not know if I am right—I believe that Mr. Cossey is in some way entangled with a lady, in short with Mrs. Quest, and that the question of whether or not he comes forward again depends upon her."

"Upon my word," said the colonel, "upon my word the thing gets worse and worse. I never heard anything like it; and for money, too. The thing is beyond me."

"At any rate," she answered, "there it is. And now, Col. Quaritch, one word before I go in. It is difficult for me to speak without saying too much or too little, but I do want you to understand how honored and how grateful I feel for what you have told me tonight—I am so little worthy of all you have given me—and to be honest, I cannot feel as pained about it as I ought to feel. It is feminine vanity, you know, nothing else. I am sure that you will not press me to say more."

"No," he answered, "no. I think that I understand the position. But, Ida, there is one thing that I must ask—you will forgive me if I am wrong in doing so, but all this is very sad for me. If in the end circumstances should alter, as I pray heaven that they may, or if Mr. Cossey's previous entanglements should prove too much for him, will you marry me, Ida?"

She thought for a moment, and then rising from the seat, gave him her hand, and said simply:

"Yes, I will marry you."

He made no answer, but lifting her hand, touched it gently with his lips.

"Meanwhile," she went on, "I have your promise, and I am sure that you will not betray it, come what may."

"No," he said, "I will not betray it."

And they went in.

In the drawing room they found the squire puzzling over a sheet of paper, on which were scrawled some of George's accounts in figures, which at first sight bore about as much resemblance to Egyptian hieroglyphics as they did to those in use to-day.

"Halloo!" he said, "there you are. Where on earth have you been?"

"We have been looking at the castle in the moonlight," answered Ida, coolly. "It is beautiful."

"Um—ah," said the squire, dryly, "I have no doubt that it is beautiful, "but isn't the grass rather damp? Well, look here," and he held up the sheet of hieroglyphics; "perhaps you can add this up, Ida, for it is more than I can. George has bought stock and all sorts of things at the sale today, and here is his account; three hundred and seventy-two pounds he makes it, but I make it four hundred and twenty, and hang me if I can find out which is right. It is important that these accounts should be kept straight. Most important, and I cannot get this stupid fellow to do it."

Ida took the sheet of paper and added it up, with the result that she discovered both totals to be wrong. Harold, watching her, could not help wondering at the nerve of the woman who, after going through such a scene as that which had just occurred, could deliberately add up long rows of badly written figures.

And this money which her father was expending so cheerfully was part of the price for which she had bound herself.

With a sigh he rose and said good night, and went home with feelings almost too mixed to admit of accurate description. He had taken a great step in his life, and to a certain extent that step had succeeded. He had not altogether built his hopes upon sand, for from what Ida had said, and still more from what she had tacitly admitted, it was necessarily clear to him that she did more or less regard him as a man would wish to be regarded by a woman whom he dearly loved. This was a great deal, more, indeed, than he had dared to believe, but then, as is usually the case in this imperfect world, where things but too often seem to be carefully arranged at sixes and sevens, came the other side of the shield. Of what use to him was it to have won this sweet woman's love; of what use to have put this pure water of lawful happiness to his lips in the desert land of his lonely life, in order to see the cup that held it shattered at a blow? To him the story of the money loan—in consideration of which, as it were, Ida had put herself in pawn, as the Egyptians used to put the mummies of their fathers in pawn—was almost incredible. To a person of his simple and honorable nature it seemed a preposterous and unheard of thing that any man calling himself a gentleman should find it possible to sink so low as to take such advantage of a woman's dire necessity and honorable desire to save her father from misery and her race from ruin, and to extract from her a promise of marriage in consideration of value received. Putting aside his overwhelming personal interest in the matter, it made his blood boil to think that such a thing could be. And yet it was, and, what was more, he believed he knew Ida well enough to be convinced that she would not shirk the bargain. If Edward Cossey came forward to claim his bond it would be paid down to the last farthing. It was a question of £30,000, the happiness of his life and of Ida's depended upon a sum of money. If the money were forthcoming Cossey could not claim his flesh and blood. But where was it to come from? He himself was worth perhaps £10,000, or with the commutation value of his pension, possibly twelve, and he had not the means of raising a farthing more. He thought the position over till he was tired of thinking, and then with a heavy heart and yet with a strange glow of happiness shining through his grief, like sunlight through a gray sky, at last he went to sleep and dreamed that Ida had gone from him, and that he was once more utterly alone in the world.

WELL-PLACED LUCK.

A. P. Morse, of San Bernardino, Gets $15,000.

On the occasion of the December drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery Fate was pleased to be gracious to an estimable citizen of San Bernardino, Mr. A. P. Morse, and he received a profit of $15,000 on an investment of $1. Mr. Morse, is the brother of E. H. Morse, the cashier of the San Bernardino National Bank, who was murdered about a year ago. He is about 35 years of age, married and has children. He owns a prosperous paint, oil and picture store on Court street.

A reporter of the Herald recently called on Mr. Morse to learn something of the circumstances of his purchase of the lucky ticket.

"The man who acts as agent for the lottery here," said he, "had sold out his regular stock of tickets, but sent me word by my brother that he ordered a number more. I was the man who took the only two were left. An old lady came in and asked for a ticket and debated a long time between the two. Finally she took one. This left it Hobson's choice for me and I took the last ticket and won $15,000."

Elsewhere it was learned by the reporter that the old lady in question was so indignant over the trick which Fortune had played on her that she went to bed sick and did not get up for a week.

Mr. Morse is a good-looking man of medium height, and a very intelligent, jolly fellow. He enjoys an unusual degree of popularity for his humor, fairness in business and good-heartedness. There is yet to be found any man in San Bernardino who envies him his good luck. He has used about half the money in his business and will invest the remainder. He is a Republican in politics and a prominent Odd Fellow.—Los Angeles (Cal.) Herald, January 27.

A Central Attraction.

From rosy morn till dewy eve—
Her evenings, though, are all hers—
While countless calls she must receive,
She never sees her callers.
An interceding angel she
'Twixt creditor and debtor
To her unknown, except it be
By number or by letter.

I twirl the little crank around,
Announcing my intention,
And business secrets most profound
Shout into Bell's invention.
But many plans that reach her ears
Would meet with full destruction
If she divulged one-half she hears
Or learns of—by induction.

Sweet ideal pictures of her face
My inmost thoughts encumber;
The telephone I would embrace
When she inquires, "What number?"
So near and yet so far away.
'Tis quite an aggravation;
So distant is she, though they say
She's not above her station.

With little treats, to chat a while,
I often try to bribe her
In hopes that maybe some day I'll
Be more than a subscriber
A single wish to her I'd tell,
If 'twere not such a bold one;
I'd like to ring this Central belle,
The ring to be a gold one.

$2,500 REWARD FOR A LOST CAT.

The equivalent in English money of $2,500 was once offered by an old lady in London for the return of a favorite cat which had strayed or been stolen. People called her a "crank," and perhaps she was. It is unfortunate that one of the gentler sex should ever gain this title, yet many do. It is, however, frequently not their fault. Often functual derangements will apparently change a woman's entire nature. Don't blame such sufferers if they are "cranky," but tell them to use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which is an infallible remedy for "female weaknesses." It will soon restore them to their normal condition. It is warranted to give satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be returned.

WAKED UP EFFECTUALLY.

A lethargic, dormant condition of the liver is hardly to be overcome with drastic cathartics and nauseous cholagogues. A gentler, pleasanter and far more effective means exists of arousing the organ when somnolent. This is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, vouched for by the medical fraternity, tested by the public for many years. A resumption by the biliary organ of its secretive function, with the activity attendant upon health, a return to regularity of the bowels and a renewal of digestion, are the no less happy and certain results of using the Bitters systematically. Its laxative effect is never painful and drenching, its tendency being rather to perpetuate regularity than to produce a copious action. Malaria, nervousness, debility, kidney troubles and neuralgia it subdues effectually.

"ONE FOOT IN THE GRAVE."

How often do we hear the above said of some poor pilgrim o'er life's thorny path, whose tottering step, pallid face, unnatural glitter of the eye and hacking cough, and its accompanying involuntary pressure of the hand over the lungs, the seat of the dread disease—consumption—that causes the remark! Too frequently, alas! and in the interests of such unfortunates this is penned, to assure them that their steps need tend no longer towards that narrow receptacle that awaits all—that is, until life's allotted space is covered—from any such cause, for the scientific researches of Dr. R. V. Pierce, of the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, of Buffalo, N. Y., resulting in his "Golden Medical Discovery," have wrested from Nature a remedy which never fails to cure this scourge of our race (which is really nothing more nor less than Scrofula of the Lungs), if taken in time and given a fair trial.

For Scrofula in all its myriad forms, whether affecting the lung-tissues or other organs or parts, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a sovereign remedy, and the only one that is sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from its manufacturers, that it will benefit or cure, if taken in time and given a fair trial, or money paid for it will be refunded. Enlarged glands, tumors or "bunches," are dissipated by its use; old sores or ulcers healed; "white swellings," hip-joint disease, and kindred ailments, permanently cured. It's a medicine, not a beverage; a concentrated vegetable extract, without sugar or syrup in its make-up. Don't beget drunkards. As peculiar and marvelous in curative properties as in its composition. It's mission is to cure, not palliate.

"Golden Medical Discovery" invigorates and strengthens the liver and lungs, sharpens the appetite, improves digestion, purifies the blood, cleanses the system, and builds up both flesh and strength when reduced by "wasting diseases." It leads all other medicines in amount of sales. There's nothing like it for the diseases for which it is recommended, so don't be fooled into accepting any substitute, said to be "just as good." It's an insult to your intelligence when unprincipled dealers try to palm off something else upon you, just to make a little better profit! An honest dealer supplies what his customers want, without questioning their intelligence. World's Dispensary Medical Association, Proprietors, Buffalo, N. Y.

$500 REWARD is offered by the manufacturers of DR. SAGE'S CATARRH REMEDY, for a case of Catarrh in the Head which they cannot cure. By its mild, soothing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Remedy cures the worst cases, no matter of how long standing. 50c., by druggists.

THE WOES OF A POET.

One of the Craft Makes Public the Diary of One Day with the Muse.

When the public walks in and ruthlessly jumps on poetic efforts it doesn't pause to think of the circumstances which may combine to make some verses worse—so much worse—than others. Now, for instance, take a poem on sleep. Go to work on it in an office where the community in general likes to drop in every once in a while and assure you that there wasn't anything that offended them in this morning's paper. They come in one and two at a time. The first two lines are easy:

When through the west the drowsy sun
Is hastening to repose——

"Hello! How are you? Got any exchanges that you're not looking at?"

"Help yourself."

[From the other side of the room]: "No you don't; I can't allow those papers to be carried off before I've looked at them."

When through the west the drowsy sun
Is hastening to repose,
When flowers their task of beauty done——

"Ah, writing poetry, I see. I knew a fellow in Colorado who could write poetry by the yard. He was a good one."

When flowers their task of beauty done
Their weary petals close—

"Doggone these woolens. A man can't tell what the weather is going to be four hours ahead."

When every passing breeze murmurs—
When every breeze as it passes—
(Confound the meter).
When every breeze that passes sings——

"I just now drank some hot beef tea and my tongue hasn't any more skin on it than an eel. Lend me your pen a minute.

—that passes sings
A lazy——

"How soon'll you be through?"

"Next week, if I'm not luckier than I have been."

A lazy lullaby,
How sweet the kiss that slumber brings
To seal the drooping eye.

(Now, let's see if it fits together.)

When through the west the drowsy sun
Is hastening to repose,
When flowers their task of beauty done
Their weary petals close,
When every breeze that passes sings
A lazy lullaby,
How sweet the kiss that slumber brings
To seal the drooping eye.

Ought to be more than one verse? Maybe there ought; maybe there ought.—Washington Post.

He Didn't Recognize the Poem.

New Editor (to Old Schoolmate)—It hurts me, old fellow, to wound your feelings, but really we are so overstocked with poetry that it is useless to read yours. We can only accept what shows unmistakable genius.

Old Schoolmate—Well, just read that poem, and tell me what you think of it. It may prove better than you imagine.

New Editor (having read the poem)—It is as I feared, the poem shows no promise whatever. Pardon me, but it is simply absurd.

Old Schoolmate (with a broad grin)—That's just what I thought. It's a copy of some verses you wrote in my autograph album, while we were at school together.—Munsey's Weekly.

Money Enough.

Agent—Here is a book, sir, every gentleman ought to have, "Hints on Architecture."

Mr. Smallpurse—I have no use for it.

"But, sir, it teaches you how to build a beautiful villa, a regular palace, for only $5,000."

"I haven't $5,000. I haven't over $5 to my name."

"Well, the book is only $1."—New York Weekly.

The Tools He Needed.

"Why don't you work?" said a charitable lady the other day to a tramp, before whom she had placed a nicely cooked meal.

"I would," replied the vagrant, "if I had the tools."

"What sort of tools do you want?" asked the hostess.

"A knife and fork."—New York Ledger.

A Disappointment.

Mr. Jenkins—Uncle John promised to send us something for the parlor, but I never expected anything of this size.

Mr. Jenkins (after half an hour's work)—No, I'll be hanged if I did!—Munsey's Weekly.

A Considerate Debtor.

Collector—When are you going to pay this bill? I can't be coming here every day in the week.

Debtor—Well, what day could you come on, conveniently?

"I could call on Saturday."

"All right; from now on I shall expect you every Saturday."—Texas Siftings.

His Medicine.

"You've been sick, I hear," remarked one barn stormer of another.

"Yes, very sick."

"What did you take?"

"Homeopathic pills."

"Then you are a sugar cured ham."—Time.

Unsatisfactory.

The Butcher—Did you tell Mr. Gore that his bill had been running for a long time?

Collector—Yes, sir.

The Butcher—What did he say?

Collector—He said: "For heaven's sake let it stand a little while."—Life.

In These Times.

He—Kiss me, darling.

She—One moment. Have you had la grippe?

He—Yes.

She—Then wait till I take some quinine.—Life.

BEATING THE EDITOR.

How a Circus Agent Found Out the Circulation of a Country Paper.

The weekly paper on which I learned my trade was situated in a town which no circus going West ever skipped. We used to count on those circus ads. as regularly as we did on the holidays, and for years and years we were without a break. They were cash, of course, outside of the dozen free tickets which the agent left, and the money pulled the publisher through a tight place more than once. Our object was, of course, to get as high a rate as possible, and to get a high rate we had to boom the circulation. It held steady at about 450, and for the first three or four years it was sufficient to tell an agent that we printed "about a thousand copies." After that, however, there was one chap who gave us trouble. He was an agent for old Dan Rice, and he paralyzed us by asking to see the pile of paper we had wet down for the outside pages. While he didn't get to see it, he knocked our regular $40 ad. down to $30, and he had no sooner gone than we began to plan to beat him next season.

About the time he was expected we got an extra bundle of paper, fixed it with the landlord to notify us, and the idea was to wet down enough to show a full thousand copies. We were daily expecting a call when an old tramp printer slouched into the office one fine morning and asked for a job. We were just getting ready to work off the outside pages, and as he said he was used to a "Washington" he was offered a quarter to pull the edition. I was at the roller, and I soon saw that he knew his business. He could "fly" and "point" his sheets with surprising dexterity, and he brought the lever around with a "chuck" which made things shake. In two hours he reached the bottom sheet and turned to the publisher with:

"Is this all?"

"Yes, that's all."

"I make the pile four hundred and fifty."

"It's about four hundred and eighty. Here's your quarter, and perhaps I'll let you set up an auction bill this afternoon."

When afternoon came in walked the circus agent, looking as Jim Dandy as you please. We took one look at him and fainted. He was the identical chap who had done the press work of the morning. When we recovered consciousness he was holding out his blistered hands and saying:

"I'll fill out a contract at $18 and leave six tickets. Sorry for you, gentlemen, but perhaps you can get rid of that extra bundle of paper by discounting liberally on the price. I'm working this little racket all along the line, and it's curious how fast the circulation of the paper gets below five hundred."—N. Y. Sun.

OLD-TIME DANDIES.

How the Dudes Were Dressed in the Time of the Stuarts.

When Villiers, James I.'s and Charles I.'s favorite, went on his mission to Paris in 1625, says the Gentleman's Magazine, he had no fewer than seven-and-twenty suits of clothes made, the richest that embroidery, lace, silk, velvet, gold and gems could contribute, one of which was a white, uncut velvet, "set all over, both suit and cloak, with diamonds valued at £80,000, besides a great feather stuck all over with diamonds." "It was common with him," says a contemporary, "at an ordinary dancing to have his clothes trimmed with great diamond buttons and to have diamond hat-bands, cockades and earrings; to be yoked with great and manifold ropes and knots of pearl; in short, to be manacled, fettered and imprisoned in jewels."

To the prevailing extravagance in dress the satirists again allude in the severest terms. "I have much wondered," says Henry Peacham, "why our English, above other nations, should so much dote upon new fashions, but more I wonder at our want of wit that we can not invent them ourselves, but, when one is grown stale, send presently over into France to seek a new, making that noble and flourishing kingdom the magazine of our fooleries, and for this purpose many of our tailors lie leger (i. e., reside) there, and ladies jest over their gentlemen ushers to accouter them and themselves, as you see. Hence came your slashed doublets (as if the wearers were cut out to be carbonadoed upon the coals) and your half-shirts, piccadillies (now out of request), your long breeches, narrow toward the knees like a pair of smith's bellows, the spangled garters pendent to the shoe, your perfumed perukes or periwigs, to show us that lost hair may be had again for money, with a thousand such fooleries unknown to our manly forefathers."

The reader may find it a pleasant change to turn to the rhyming moralists. Here to the fore comes John Tayler, the so called water poet, launching his shafts—not too sharply pointed—at the excess of those who wear—

"A farm in shoe-strings edged with gold,
And spangled garters worth a copyhold;
A hose and doublet with a lordship cost,
A gaudy cloak (three manors' price almost),
A beaver band and feather for the head,
Prized at the church's tithe, the poor man's bread."

—If a wheel be suspended on its axle so as not to touch the ground, and be revolved, it is a fact that both the top and bottom part revolve with equal rapidity; but if the wheel be placed on the ground and revolved it must move forward. The top spokes are thus revolving forward and are also moving forward through space with the forward movement of the hub. The bottom spokes, on the contrary, are revolving backward. The difference between the velocity of the upper and lower spokes is, therefore, to be measured by the absolute forward movement of the hub.—Mobile Register.

—Extract from a novel by that gifted author, Fanny Selmington Usgirls: "While the Christmas festivities were in progress there came from the dimly-lighted hall a low, delirious sound, suggestive of osculation. Then followed a gurgle of laughter and Marian's voice, which said: 'That's a good joke on you, Arthur. It's holly up there, and not mistletoe.' But Arthur didn't seem to regret the blunder at all."—Chicago News.

SHAKESPEARE FOUNTAIN.

A Philadelphia Editor's Handsome Gift to Stratford-on-Avon.

In the Rother Market at Stratford-on-Avon there is now a lofty, spire-like fountain, with clock tower, the gift of Mr. George W. Childs to the birthplace of Shakespeare. The base of the tower is square in plan, with the addition of boldly projecting buttresses, placed diagonally at the four corners, terminating with acutely pointed tablets surmounted by a lion bearing the arms of Great Britain alternately with the American eagle associated with the Stars and Stripes. On the north face is a polished granite basin having the outline of a large segment of a circle, into which a stream of water flows constantly. On the east and west sides are large troughs for the use of horses and cattle and beneath these smaller troughs for sheep and dogs. A door on the south side affords admission to the interior, and is flanked by shallow niches, one of which contains a barometer and the other a thermometer. Immediately over the basins and the door are molded pointed arches, and in oblong spaces between the margins of the basins and the opening of the arches are the following inscriptions cut into the stone:

I.

The gift of an American citizen, George W. Childs of Philadelphia, to the town of Shakespeare, in the jubilee year of Queen Victoria.

II.

In her days every man shall eat, in safety
Under his own vine, what he plants; and sing
The merry songs of peace to all his neighbors.
God shall be truly known; and those about her
From her shall read the perfect ways of honor,
And by those claim their greatness not by blood.
—Henry VIII., Act V., Scene 2

III.

Honest water, which ne'er left man i' the mire.
—Timon of Athens, Act I., scene 2.

IV.

Ten thousand honors and blessings on the bard who has gilded the dull realities of life with innocent illusions.—Washington Irving's visit to Stratford-on-Avon.

The next story of the tower has on each face a triple arcade, with glazed arches that light a small chamber in which the clock is placed. Above this are the four dials of the clock under crocketed gables with finials representing Puck, Mustard Seed, Peas Blossom and Cobwed. The clock-faces project slightly from a cylindrical tower flanked by four other smaller three-quarter attached turrets of the same plan; from the main central cylinder springs a spire of a slightly concave outline, and the four turrets have similar but much smaller spirelets all five springing from the same level, and all terminating in lofty gilded vanes.—Philadelphia Record.

WALL STREET LIFE.

The Demoralizing Effects of Speculation on Young Men.

Wall street life is demoralizing. It unfits men for legitimate work and for business requiring energy and hard work. The street is surrounded with temptations to gamble in other petty ways, and especially to drink. The Wall street gin-mills are numerous and gaudy and seductive. A hit of a few hundred dollars in a man's favor tempts him to take a drink of jubilation, while a loss demands the cup of consolation. Money is made and lost on so big a scale that young men especially are fascinated by the rapidity of the pace and the magnitude of the business. There is temptation to prodigality in cabs and in dinners and lunches which is freely gratified. A young man who has spent a year in Wall street brokers' offices, who makes $300 to-day and loses $400 to-morrow and makes $200 the next, isn't going to consider the value of a $10 or $20 bank note when his own pleasure or comfort is under consideration. When at the end of the year he finds himself with hardly $100 to his name he is entirely and absolutely unfitted for work, and he is more inclined to put $10 in a bucket-shop with the hope of making it $20 than to work on a clerk's wages. He has become interested in petroleum and grain, and horse races and lottery tickets, and matching half-dollars and draw-poker, and work is very tiresome. He, in short, is good for nothing. The down-town saloons are full of these Wall street wrecks. They are on hand for drinks, but are good for nothing when there is work to be done.

On the other hand, the fast life of the street, in good times especially, helps along a great variety of trade. The average speculator likes to go to the theater and the opera, and he takes a jolly party with him as a rule. The good effects of a Wall street boom are felt in the shops. Retail dealers say that they can tell when things are booming by the way women spend money—for a large proportion of the money made gets around into the pockets of the women, after all. The man who has made a thousand dollars in a day feels very liberal after dinner, and the wife is sure to get a bit of it before it is lost on the following day, and she in turn is quite sure to transfer it to the jeweler, or the furrier, or the avenue milliner. And thus there is gain to all.—Julian Ralph, in Chicago News.

—A Boston physician tells of a case of an attack of hay fever that was arrested by the patient breaking his leg. Hay-fever victims who go several hundred miles from home to escape the disease should cut this out and paste it on their handkerchiefs. If breaking a leg should fail to effect a cure in some cases, breaking the neck would be certain to go right to the spot. Beware of imitations.—Norristown Herald.

PULLED OFF HIS BOOT.

Why an Old Gentleman Thought That He Talked Quite Enough.

The narratives of the recent train robberies in Texas remind me of an occurrence of the sort that happened in the year 1881, and in which I was one of the victims.

We were traveling from San Antonio to El Paso—an old and wealthy friend and myself. To save ourselves, in a measure, the usual tediousness of the journey we engaged in a social game of cards, and to heighten the interest had staked some small sums of money. In drawing some small change from his pocket, my friend dropped a roll of greenbacks into the aisle. A neatly-dressed young man, on an opposite seat, picked it up and handed it to its owner with the remark:

"Rather a nice little wad to have out if the train robbers should happen around!"

He had been a very sociable companion during the earlier part of the trip, and we had taken a liking to him. His only drawback seemed to be a want of knowledge concerning life in Western Texas.

"Yes," returned the old man; "but I hardly expect any more train robberies in Texas. Why, it's been eight months since we've had one. Well, if they do get this little pile I'm safe, anyhow. I've got twenty times that much more, and they wouldn't know where I had it, I'm just a little too cute for 'em. They never think of making a man pull off his boots."

The young man smiled. During the remainder of the afternoon he stood on the gallery of the coach, "taking a good look at the country; it was so different from Missouri, where he came from."

Suddenly about dark the train stopped. Some one exclaimed: "Don't shoot!"

Our young acquaintance stepped from the gallery into the car.

"What's the matter? What's the matter?" queried my elder companion.

"Oh, not much, not much," was the slow reply; "only I guess, old fellow" (here he leveled a revolver at him), "I guess it's about time for you to pull off your boots."

The car filled with armed men. The usual programme was successfully carried out.

When the train was permitted to travel on I flung myself into the seat left vacant by the innocent young Missourian (?), put my hands in my empty pockets and meditated until we reached our destination. My old friend lighted a cigar, propped his boots (those treasureless boots) on a seat in front of him, and said he'd be hanged if he'd say a word till he reached El Paso. He thought he had said enough for one day.—Detroit Free Press.

COSTA RICAN FLOWERS.

A Region Where Nature Is More Florescent Than Anywhere Else.

A San Jose (Costa Rica) correspondent writes: Nowhere is nature more florescent than in this portion of Costa Rica, where the choicest treasures of the tropics not only grow spontaneously, but develop themselves into new and astonishing varieties. Here the orchids are peerless in variety of form and color, and diffuse ineffable fragrance. Though growing parasitically on the trunks and branches of trees, upon fences and housetops, or whatever they can attach themselves, they draw nourishment only from the atmosphere, each flower generally remaining in blossom about three months. Some of them are as singularly freakish as though endowed with animal life, assuming the most grotesque shapes in imitation of beasts, birds and reptiles. Often it is difficult to believe that the bright thing fluttering above in all its brilliancy of coloring is not a huge butterfly; others are like spiders, bees, bull heads, fishes, etc., and the others shudderingly like wriggling lizzards or gracefully swaying serpents. They abound in greatest profusion and most fantastic loveliness in the deep, damp forests, where man seldom penetrates, yet have been known to thrive well when transferred to city gardens. They have been largely exported of late years to the United States and England, in the latter country being so highly prized that I have known one fragile plant to bring the fabulous price of £700!

The flower most greatly valued in Costa Rica (which is really a species of orchid) has been given the name of esperito santo, or "Holy Ghost." The base of the blossom is pure white, in the perfect form of a large vase or chalice, while escaping from within it is the complete similitude of an exquisite dove with outstretched wings. So striking is the resemblance that the superstitious natives attach to it a supernatural meaning, and the neglect to cross one's self at the sight of the phenomenon would be construed into proof conclusive of rank heresy. The most irreverent Yankee, however, would feel like taking off his hat before such a wonder as I lately saw clinging to the red tiles of a house top—an enormous cluster of espiritos santos burst simultaneously into bloom, forming a mammoth and magnificent bouquet. Above the multitude of snowy vases a thousand doves appeared to be hovering, their outspread wings—in various shades of purple, from the deepest tint to palest lilac—shimmering with recent dews, as though powdered with diamond dust.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A FAITHFUL ENGINEER.

How He Protected the Property of the Company That Employed Him.

A few years ago the rolling stock of the Wabash road was in a bad state of repair, and all train men were instructed to exercise the utmost caution in order to prevent accidents. I was a passenger one day by a train running from Indiana to Springfield, Ill. Not far from the Illinois capital the train ran for two or three miles with aggravating slowness barely moving, and at length came to a halt. I was one of the dozen passengers who got off to ascertain the cause of the delay.

"Locomotive broke down?" I inquired of the engineer, who sat in the cab with his hand on the throttle.

"No; I guess not," was the reply.

"Bad track along here?"

"Not very. No wuss than other places."

"Are you out of coal, or water, or any thing?"

"Not's I knows on."

"Then, why in thunder don't you go ahead? We passengers have seen enough of the scenery about here."

"Look a-here, stranger, be you runnin' this ingine, or me? I guess I know my business. D'ye see that mule on the track up ahead thar, with his ail this way? I've been follerin' that mule for two mile. He's stopped now to git some bottle-flies off hisself, an' we can't go on till he gets through."

"But why don't you drive ahead and scare or knock him off the track?"

"Looky here, stranger, be you runnin' this ingine, or me? I guess I know my business. My orders is to exercise all possible caution in runnin' trains on account o' the lives o' the passengers, an' to protect the property of the comp'ny; an' I'm goin' to do it if it takes all summer. Stranger, you don't know that mule as well as I do, or you wouldn't talk about scarin' or knockin' him off the track. If I was to run down ag'in' him and disturb his meditations 'bout the meanness of bottle-flies, he'd up an' kick this ingine all to smithereens. If you'll be a little patient, I'll get you into Springfield some time afore morning; but, if we go to foolin' with that mule, we shan't git there till next week."

"But," says I, "if—"

"Hi, there!" yelled the engineer; "you'd better git abroad. The mule's comin' this way, an' I'm goi'n' to back up."—Drake's Travelers' Magazine.

WILLIAM PENN'S TABLE.

The Interesting Piece of Furniture Owned by a Pennsylvania Doctor.

Dr. J. H. Hepburn, of Reimersburg, Pa., has a table which was once the property of William Penn. The table and four chairs that matched it were presented to William Bradford, the pioneer printer and publisher of this country. They were sacredly kept in the Bradford family until 1820, when they fell into the possession of the third William Bradford, a printer in New York City. He set no value on ancient furniture, and stored it in his garret. Among his apprentices was an Irish boy named Barney McGowan. His parents were very poor, and at one time were forced to part with such scant furniture as they had to pay the rent. Young Barney mentioned this circumstance to his employer one day, and Bradford had the Penn chairs and table brought from the garret and gave them to McGowan with the remark: "These things once belonged to William Penn, and my father and grandfather prized them highly. But I have no liking for such rubbish, and if they will relieve the distress of your family, you are welcome to them." A few years ago the McGowans moved to Gloucester, N. J. There lived there at that time J. H. Hepburn, owner of what was once a celebrated collection of curios in Philadelphia known as Grott's Museum. To Hepburn the McGowans became indebted for rent, and in other ways, to the amount of thirty dollars. They could not pay, but offered Hepburn the Penn table in liquidation of his claim. He investigated the history of the furniture and found that it was genuine. He took the table and canceled the debt. The four chairs were no longer in possession of the McGowans, and it is not known what became of them. Hepburn was the father of Dr. Hepburn, the present owner of the ancient table. The table is of solid walnut and has two folding leaves. It is oval in shape. There are two drawers, one in each end. The table is four feet and seven inches long and five feet wide when the leaves are raised. It is very heavy and solidly built, with no attempt at ornamentation. An offer of five hundred dollars was refused for it.—Baltimore American.

A Woeful History.

Two friends are walking along the street. One of them, pointing to a house, says:

"There's a beautiful place, but it's enough to make a man sad to look at it."

"Why so?"

"On account of its history; for, despite its calm and serene surroundings, it was built upon the groans, tears, wailings and blood of widows, orphans, old men and struggling women."

"You don't say so. Was it built by a railroad monopolist?"

"Oh, no; by a dentist."—Arkansaw Traveler.

VALUE OF AUTOGRAPHS.

Some Reflections of Interest to Ardent Collectors of Signatures.

A collector of autographs, as of other things, and almost beyond other collectors, enjoys a second pleasure, beside that of contemplating and exhibiting. Collectors have no overweening pride in their own durability or in that of their collections. They know they and theirs are mortal, and will come to Wellington street in time. Meanwhile, they have the charming occupation of watching the turn of their market, and speculating on the eventful value of their investments. As they experience whenever they bid and buy, the oldest established among their favorite wares were continually going up and down. It might be expected that autographs, like the rest of the world's treasures, should vary with the rising or declining prosperity of the day. That is natural. It is more surprising to find that relative values are never steady and fixed. Hume, and Johnson, and Voltaire, it is manifest, are no longer autograph names to conjure by. Bolingbroke, Queen Elizabeth, George Washington and Carlyle attract no such ardent worshipers as Lamb, Shelley, Keats, Dickens and Thackeray.

When there are such vicissitudes in the worth of the names of personages whose rank might be presumed to have been long ago determined, it is clear that the autograph collector is left more or less to guess work in appraising in shillings and pounds the handwriting of living celebrities. Yet, he can not escape the risks; and, if he have the genuine collector's passion, he ought to revel in the necessity. Any body with a long purse can buy up letters by Shelley, Lamb, Scott and Byron. True sagacity and insight are requisite to invest successfully upon the autographic prospects of the existing generation. Collectors who plunge upon a rising statesman may find that he is no better than a political Mr. Toots. They may have amassed manuscript verses by the bard of the future to discover that the future pronounces the phenomenon a poetaster.

To turn over the pages of an autograph album of living or all but living names is to walk through a neglected churchyard. But, on the other hand, there are occasional consolations. In the darkest corner of a birthday book may lurk a name, requested out of reluctant politeness, which hereafter will fetch guineas in the auction-room. It should nerve the genius of the obscurities of the generation to feel that by a bound into fame they will confer the sincerest gratification at any rate upon all possessors of their autographs.—London Times.

JAVANESE DANCERS.

They Move in a Sinuous Sedateness Quite Impossible to Describe.

They were neither noisy nor abandoned. The music was slow, regular and savage only in timbre. It tortured the nerves in an insidious and unsuspected way only—like certain forms of Chinese punishment, which at first seems wholly unbearable—and did not assail them violently, as did that of the Spanish and Egyptian virtuosi. And to its unphrased, unmodulate monotony the dancers moved with trailing steps in slow—infinitely slow—curves, wreathing their arms, or rather their hands, with the wrist as a pivot, in a sinuous sedateness quite impossible to characterise or describe.

As they circled about the little stage a solemn-visaged youth in—perhaps—full canonicals, surrounded by a group of attendant girls, they seemed to be performing a series of barn-yard evolutions, as of a slowly-strutting cock encircled by his harem of hens. It was decorous to the point of solemnity, and the sense of measure was certainly preserved to an almost measureless degree. The dancers were never carried beyond themselves by the entrain of the dance, but very visibly and agreeably controlled and regulated their gestures and poses. In this sense the performance was clearly an artistic one. But at the end of half an hour the observer who did not find it monotonous must have been a determined seeker after sensations.

The elaborate but limited sinuosity of the waving hands and flexible wrists seemed at last perfectly insipid, and, instead of being intentional, merely the reduction to a factitious appearance of order, of movements, in reality haphazard and fortuitous, by a slowing of the pace to such an extent that the sense of slowness disguised the lack of character in the design. After the Gitanas any exhibition of decorum was agreeable, but before long the emptiness of pure decorum made itself dismally perceived, and one could not help thinking that the Parisian amateurs who went into ecstacies over the Javanese did not analyze their sensations with sufficient assiduity.—Scribner.

Danger in Swapping Gum.

The practice of chewing gum has become very widespread. It is not a very elegant habit; to many it is positively repulsive; and there are sources of danger, too, that should not be overlooked. A case in point was related to us a few days ago. Diphtheria broke out in a family in East Des Moines. After the child had recovered, and the clothing and all the exposed articles were fully disinfected, the parents, with the convalescent child, visited some relatives in the country. The indispensable chewing gum, like Satan, went also in the mouth of the little child. Prompted by generosity, it allowed its country cousins—two children—to chew also the gum previously chewed by the visiting child. In three or four days, without any other known source of infection than the chewing gum, the two children were simultaneously stricken down with diphtheria in a most serious form. It would be hard to imagine a more successful mode of propagating—distributing the disease. It would be a great deal safer not to chew the stuff at all, but if it must be done to satisfy the demands of a weak head and a depraved appetite, our advice is, don't "swap" gum; don't chew anybody's else gum nor allow anybody else to chew yours.—Iowa Monthly Bulletin.

Why Some Women Are Ill.

The average woman understands just about as much about anatomy as a French doll. Look at our girls and tell me how many of them are up in that all important study—physiology. Yes, every thing else under the sun is crammed into their heads, while they are allowed to drift into womanhood totally ignorant of the needs and necessities of that delicate structure, the human body. A time comes, and it is generally too late when they awake to the fact that they are physical wrecks. I do not think that I am exaggerating the matter at all when I speak so emphatically. I am constantly called to visit women who have, through ignorance alone, developed the most distressing complaints. Troubles that, were I frank with them, they would understand as incurable and must go down with them to the grave.—A Philadelphia Physician.

County Official Paper.

An opportunity is now open to the people of the lower end of Owens Valley to promote a work that will be of vast benefit to themselves without the expenditure of any money on their part. During the past two years L. D. Matthews of San Francisco has made several visits to Independence and neighborhood. He came here again last Monday and gives the following account of this and all of his other visits here: Certain capitalists of San Francisco have made careful investigation into the feasibility of conveying the water of Owens river onto the land in Salt Wells Valley. They are now quite satisfied that the scheme is quite practicable. They are also satisfied that there is plenty of water for Owens Valley and for their use also, provided large storage dams shall be built to collect the water in winter and when the river is in flood. Locations for the necessary dams are already selected. One of these would be Haiwai Meadows and another in the Valley just south of the Meadows. A third reservoir would be made by building a dam at the lower end of Little Lake. What is known as the Seely Ditch would be built around the west side of Owens Lake and this would give elevation enough to carry the water over the ridge south of Olancha and over into Haiwai. The projectors of this enterprise have carefully estimated the cost and are prepared to furnish all the money necessary. The rights of every person owning land and the use of water from Owens river from the head of the canal southward will be respected and properly guarded. It is hoped and expected that where the canal must pass through patented lands the owners of those lands will meet the builders of the canal in a liberal spirit so far as right of way is concerned. The building of this canal and the necessary reservoirs for water storage will cost about a million dollars and most of this vast amount would be spent in this locality. All real estate and other property would increase in value from the day when work should begin. An immediate demand would be created for large quantities of all kinds of farm produce, and a large force of men and animals would at once be employed. There are many other considerations that strongly commend this project to the people of Owens Valley. Mr. Matthews intends to call upon every land holder along the line of the proposed canal and fully explain what the projectors intend and expect. It is safe to say he will be well received everywhere.

Congressman Vandever has introduced a bill to establish the "Yosemite National Park." Unless Yosemite and the mountain region that lies above it and where the streams that flow into the valley have their source shall be protected, as the Yellowstone Park is protected, all that is destructible of the beauty of the wonderful valley will surely be destroyed. These grand and beautiful scenes should be preserved from the ravages of individual greed, and from the scarcely less destructive meddling of ignorant politicians. The Yosemite belongs to the Nation and should be carefully guarded as one of the chief attractions of California. Kate Field in "Washington" has done much to arouse a strong feeling in favor of the protection of the Yosemite.

The Grand Mufti.

He is nominated by the sultan, but he can only choose one of the three highest functionaries; these, again, are nominated by the sultan, but under a similar restriction; and so progressively downward, the sultan always nominating, but only from the eligible persons determined and presented by the hierarchical progression of the body itself. It finally rests upon the students in the different colleges who are raised the first two steps by collegiate degrees. The grand mufti, the cazaskiers of Anatoly and Roumely, the three cadis of the first cities, and some other dignitaries from the supreme council of Ulema, or learned men. The ordinary functions have reference to their own corporation, but in all extraordinary or doubtful occasions they are consulted by the government; they are not invited to join the divan, but the case is submitted to them. Thus, for instance, before the measures against Mehemet Ali were adopted they were appealed to, and it was on their felva itself, rehearsed in the firman, that he was declared an outlaw, or, according to their expression, a "Firmanli." The case is not presented to them in the form of documents to examine, but as a solicitor prepares a case for submission to counsel. It is said: "M. or N. has done so and so. Is his act lawful or unlawful; and if so, what is the penalty?" This is the form in which cases with foreign powers are submitted.—The National Review.

MANUFACTURING CORKS.

FACTS ABOUT A USEFUL BUT NEGLECTED LITTLE ARTICLE.

The Raw Material Comes from Spain. Dame Nature Kind to the Trees—The Machinery Used in Reducing the Bark to "Stoppers" and How It Works.

Just at the present time a business which makes about as little as any business can well make and keep itself from swamping is the making of corks.

Chicago can boast of but two such establishments, and at first glance there seems literally no reason at all why it should not be a most lucrative business.

There is ever a steady demand for corks; the employes are kept busy almost continually and receive tolerably fair wages; each of the Chicago houses has a good trade, both wholesale and retail, yet they make no money.

Some time ago the cork manufacturers formed a league under which they bound themselves to certain things. For a time all went well, but soon it was discovered that several were not fulfilling their agreement and the entire thing was, to put it mildly, "busted."

At present, therefore, they are proceeding on the "go as you please" plan, and each one is heartily sick of it. Obstinacy and the hope of better things in the future are all that prevent many of them from selling out.

What would champagne be without the cork, and yet when it leaves its sanctum in the mouth of the bottle, with its soul inspiring "pop," so much anxiety is felt to get at what is beyond it that no thought whatever is given to the insignificant cork; yet had it the gift of speech of what wonderful things it could tell.

THE BARK AND ITS COST.

Every piece of cork which enters this city has been brought all the way from sunny Spain. In the climate of no other country will the cork tree, whence it all comes, thrive as under the blue skies of Spain. Large quantities are shipped every year from Madrid, Lisbon, and one or two other cities, one of the Chicago houses alone using nearly 6,000 bales last year.

The entire bark is stripped from the tree trunk, leaving it naked and bare, but Dame Nature is kind, and soon a new covering begins to appear, of which it is again deprived by man, rapacious of gain. Seldom is the bark of much more than an inch in thickness, for the good reason that it is usually taken off ere it has time to grow thicker. However, the tree cannot live and be robbed of its bark oftener than once in six years.

The bark is broken or cut into pieces averaging a foot or more in length and various widths, pressed out flat, and packed in bales. These are transported to some seaport town, stowed away in vessels, and carried to New York. The average cost of a bale upon landing runs from $18 to $50 or $60, depending, of course, upon the quality of the material.

Some of the bark is exceedingly porous, with streaks and holes running through it, which does not bring the price, naturally, which is paid for that which is entirely free from blemish. The last mentioned is called "velvet cork," and used only in bottles filled with the finest wines. Such a self willed substance as champagne otherwise might make its way through the cork.

Upon reaching the factory the bales are unpacked, and piece by piece soaked for a short time—not more than ten or twenty minutes—in a vat filled with boiling water, after which the cork is softer and much easier to handle.

A cutter takes the pieces, places them within reach of a rapidly revolving wheel, with an edge so sharp that it is best to keep one's fingers at a safe distance. The bark is cut by this wheel into strips, the width of the diameter of the required cork. The strips are then placed in front of a cylindrical instrument, which moves back and forth at the will of the manipulator, and punches out the corks, much after the same fashion that our grandmothers punched out those good old fashioned cookies, which were the delight of our childhood.

The next machine with which the cork comes into close contact is a most complex one. A cup like receptacle is extended, the operative, in the case spoken of, a young girl, quickly places therein the cork; it is withdrawn, held against a horizontal, sharp and rapidly revolving wheel in such a manner that the outside is pared off with that peculiar soft crunching sound that cork makes, leaving one end reduced in size and the whole cut in a uniform shape.

The waste material and finished cork are then dropped by the machine into receptacles placed to receive them and the cup extended for yet another cork.

The whole thing is done in the twinkling of an eye; almost before you see the cork in place it is trimmed, dropped, and the machine is ready for another.

The operator sits in a low seat beside the machine, and as she feeds it performs with head and body a peculiar weaving motion back and forth, although she herself is evidently unconscious of it.

Everything in this country is done by machinery, but the reporter was shown some beautiful carving from cork done by hand by foreign workmen. A small cottage was complete even to the shingles on the roof and the palings of the fence. A linked chain, which had been over a yard long and all made of one piece of bark, was also quite a curiosity, as were the neatest of wine glasses and several other small articles.—Chicago Tribune.

An Improvement in Propellers.

One of the great difficulties encountered with the ordinary screw propeller in use is the liability to be thrown clear of the water by the pitching of the vessel in a heavy sea, thereby rocking and wrenching the machinery, and the ease with which it becomes disabled by fouling with cables or by striking any heavy floating object. A Scotch mechanic, however, has invented a method of placing the propeller, which entirely does away with both of these objections. At the stern of an ordinary vessel the keel is divided into two sections, leaving a space wherein the propeller is placed. Sluices are left in the sections of the double keel, through which the water may readily pass. By the working model of this invention it has been demonstrated that much greater forward speed can be secured with no greater expenditure of power, while the speed in going astern is fully equal to that secured in moving ahead.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Steven Decker vs. Ida C. Decker—Action for divorce. Complaint filed.

BORN.

ROBERTS—At Round Valley, April 2, to Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Roberts, a son.

The Broder-Conklin trial begins Tuesday

Miss Martha Dodge was up from Lone Pine yesterday.

Mr. Andy Dell of Bishop was in town a few days this week.

P. W. Forbes spent a few days this week at and near Independence.

Recent quotations for borax in New York are 9½c to 9¾c per pound, at wholesale prices.

Judge Sewell, formerly Chief-Justice of Nevada, and Colonel Ellis, formerly of Carson, now of San Francisco, are expected here this evening.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Walker and Miss Teresa Walker came up from Olancha yesterday and are yet in town. Mr. Walker has entirely recovered from his recent attack of sickness.

J. G. Dodge of Lone Pine was in town yesterday. He is badly scarred on the face and hands by fire. He estimates his loss in the recent fire at over three thousand dollars.

Joe Diaz has been prospecting in Mazourka Canyon, near Independence, for several months past. He thinks the prospect good and has found rich ore at a depth of forty feet.

William Mooney, a well known former resident of Bodie, died at Wellington, Lyon county, Nevada, on March 31st, of pneumonia. He was a native of Belfast, Ireland, aged 56 years.

Thirty-four thousand dollars worth of Inyo county 7 per cent. bonds have been exchanged for the new 5 per cent. bonds and it is expected that the State will take twenty thousand dollars more of the 5 per cent. bonds to-morrow.

Every farmer should read the speech delivered by Senator Stanford in the Senate in favor of Government loans on real estate. Copies of the speech can be had at the office of the INYO INDEPENDENT. This is the most important subject introduced in Congress since the close of the war.

Mr. Charles S. Aiken, representing the San Francisco Bulletin, has been at Independence all the week. Mr. Aiken is a very interesting and pleasant gentleman; but this is just what would be expected in the representative of so clean a paper as the Bulletin.

Richard S. Miner Esq. arrived at Independence last Wednesday. He is yet in poor health and is accompanied by his physician, Dr. Page of San Francisco. Mr. Miner has already received great benefit from change of climate and says he is gaining strength rapidly.

The Board of Supervisors will meet in special session at 6 o'clock p. m. on April 16th for the purpose of making arrangements for the transportation of witnesses in the Elliott case and for paying their expenses. Also to consider the matter of appointing a License Collector.

H. H. Spear passed through town last Monday on his way back from Mojave. He says that at Mojave he saw nine or ten carloads of railroad ties and was told that they had been delivered there for the Carson and Colorado railroad. If this be true it gives greater probability to the rumors that have been current recently of the speedy extension of the road.

Parties at Porterville, in Tulare county, are making efforts to organize a large party of tourists for a trip to Mt. Whitney and neighborhood. Saddle animals, board and other necessaries will be provided for the party and the cost to each tourist will be quite reasonable. This is the first effort made to bring a large party of tourists into the heart of the Sierra Nevada mountains. Once fully known that region will attract large numbers of visitors.

Examining Committee's Report.

At the meeting of the Board of Directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association held at Independence on January 4th a Committee was appointed to examine all accounts and the books of the Secretary and Treasurer from the organization of the Association till date. The Committee consisted of F. McIver, E. Robinson and A. W. Eibeshutz. Last Saturday the Committee made its report to the Board of Directors and will be found in the proceedings of the meeting published this week. The books of the Secretary show the name of each person who ever paid any money to the Association, the amount and date of each payment, and what the money was for. Receipts from the Treasurer to the Secretary were shown for every cent of money received by the latter for the Association. The history of every bill presented since the organization of the Association is shown on the record book; and the original of all those bills, properly filed and marked, were handed to the Committee by the Secretary and carefully examined and found correct. The Treasurer showed to the Committee warrants drawn by the Secretary and other sufficient vouchers for all the sums he had paid out of the treasury of the Association from its organization till date.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m., at Georges Creek at 2:30 p. m. and at Independence at 7:30 o'clock evening; Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

DIRECTORS' MEETING.

The Board of Directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association met at Independence last Saturday, all the members present. Minutes of preceding meeting read and approved.

This being the time for the election of a President of the Association A. R. Conklin was chosen by unanimous vote.

The Committee heretofore appointed to examine all books and accounts of the Secretary and Treasurer of the Association from its organization up to date presented the following report:

To the Board of Directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association. Gentlemen:—Your Committee to whom was referred the examination of the accounts and books of the Secretary and Treasurer of the Association, herewith submit the following report:

The books, records and vouchers of the Secretary show that for the year 1887, he received from all sources the sum of $5,193 40
For the year 1888 the sum of 2,945 15
For the year 1889 the sum of 3,866 98

Total $12,005 53

Vouchers drawn during 1887 .. $5,283 52
Vouchers drawn during 1888 .... 3,831 20
Vouchers drawn during 1889 .... 3,824 42

Total $12,939 14

Showing a balance of vouchers drawn over receipts of $933 61.

The books and vouchers of the Treasurer show that for the year 1887 he received the sum of $5,124 25
For the year 1888 he received 2,930 50
For the year 1889 he received 3,866 98

Making a total receipt of $11,921 73

Disbursements for 1887 ..... $5,077 60
Disbursements for 1888 ..... 3,010 56
Disbursements for 1889 ..... 3,766 47

Total $11,854 63

Leaving a balance in the hands of the Treasurer of $67 10.

We find that the actual indebtedness of the Association at the date hereof, to wit: April 5, 1890, is, exclusive of the mortgage, $866 51.

From this sum should be deducted the sum advanced for the construction of speed track, being $170. Showing an actual indebtedness of $696 51.

Your Committee recommend that the Secretary and Treasurer be furnished with suitable warrant and record books, and that all warrants be drawn only for such claims as are allowed by the proper authority, and be registered and paid in order of their presentation.

We consider and it is the duty of the Treasurer to pay all warrants drawn without arrogating to himself the power to discriminate which orders shall have preference or be paid. The possession of a warrant signed by the President and Secretary is sufficient voucher for the Treasurer for the validity of his act of payment.

Respectfully submitted,
F. McIVER, Chairman.
E. ROBINSON.
A. W. EIBESHUTS.

It will be seen that there is a difference of $83 80 between the receipts of the Secretary and Treasurer. For this amount vouchers in the hands of the Secretary were shown.

A report was presented from the Treasurer and ordered placed on file.

The proposition of Independence Water Works to furnish water for use on the Pavilion grounds for one year at a total cost of $25 was accepted and the Secretary ordered to draw his warrant for that sum.

The Committee before appointed to confer with the people of Bishop on choice of a location for holding the fair of 1890 offered a report which was ordered received and placed on file.

Messrs. T. F. A. Connelly and H. C. Hartshorne, a committee representing the Land and Stock Association of Bishop, appeared before the Board and offered the following:

To the Board of Directors of the 18th Agricultural Association. Gentlemen:—In consideration of Bishop being designated as the place to hold your next Annual Fair, We, the Land and Stock Association of Bishop, will furnish a Pavilion, Race Track and Stock Exhibition Grounds, and all the aid and assistance we can render, to assist in said Annual Fair.

We will defray all expenses necessarily incurred by the Board of Directors which cannot be paid through the State Appropriation.

We pledge ourselves and the people of our surroundings to work faithfully in the interests of the 18th District Agricultural Association; that we will make every exertion, and use all our influence to make the Fair of next year at Independence a success in number and exhibit, and by our combined efforts, laying a foundation that will grow firmer and be more lasting and useful as the years progress.

(Not signed).

President of Land and Stock Association at Bishop.

By its Committee appointed to confer with a Committee acting on the part of the 18th District Agricultural Association.

T. F. A. CONNELLY.
H. C. HARTSHORN.

Messrs. Sneden and Connelly addressed the Board in favor of the proposition.

A. R. Conklin offered the following:

Resovled, That the Fourth Annual Fair of the 18th District Agricultural Association for the year 1890, be held at the town of Bishop, in the County of Inyo, Provided said town of Bishop furnish the necessary Pavilion buildings for all exhibits produced at said Fair, as also the speed track and other necessities required to conduct the same, and that said facilities shall so be furnished free of all cost and expense to said Association.

Resolved, That the Fourth Annual Fair of said Association be held at the town of Bishop, Inyo county, on the——of September, 1890, and continue for four days.

Resolved, That after the present Annual Fair the same shall be held at Independence and every alternate year thereafter.

The resolutions were voted upon as a whole and the vote resulted as follows:

Ayes—John S. Gorman, W. S. Enos, Finley McIver, A. R. Conklin.

Noes—C. A. Walter, E. Robinson, A. W. Eibeshutz, Nathan Rhine.

Not having received a majority of the votes cast the President declared the resolutions rejected.

Nathan Rhine presented the following bills: Interest on mortgage, $456 96. Insurance, $75.

The Finance Committee reported the bills correct and the Secretary was ordered to draw his warrant for the amount.

A. W. Eibeshutz offered the following:

Resolved, That the next Fair of the 18th District Association be held at the town within the District which will pay to the Association in money the largest premium for said privilege, and furnish the necessary buildings and speed track for use during said Fair. Bids for same to be advertised for in one newspaper published in each county included in the District. Proposals for the same to be forwarded to the Secretary of the Association on or before May 17th, 1890.

A vote was taken and the President declared the resolution adopted.

A protest having been entered by David Grum against the payment to Gustave Sanger of certain premiums awarded to the latter for standard trotters exhibited at the last Fair of the Association, until said Gustave Sanger furnish to the Board of Directors satisfactory proof that the animals so exhibited are standard trotters, according to the rules of the National Association of breeders of standard trotters; and Mr. Sanger having been duly notified of the filing of said protest and of the proof required, and not having offered any proof, therefore Director Eibeshutz offered the following:

Resolved, That the protest offered by David Grum against payment to Gustave Sanger of premiums of sixty dollars for exhibit of standard trotters be sustained and the said sum is hereby ordered returned into the treasury of the Association.

On a vote being taken the President declared the resolution adopted.

Director Eibeshutz offered a resolution to the effect that the Secretary of the Association procure a warrant book and such other books as may be necessary. The resolution was adopted.

There being no further business the Board adjourned subject to call by the President.

To Show Up Owens Valley.

The Virginia Enterprise says that Mr. H. M. Yerington and his associates will this spring plant large quantities of wine, table and raisin grapes at various points in Owens Valley along the line of the C. and C. railroad. It is also stated that prune, almond, walnut and other fruit and nut-bearing trees will be planted in large numbers. The object of this is to prove the fertility of the soil and mildness of the climate. As most of these things are already grown here in considerable quantity and of the highest excellence, nothing will be risked in planting more. In the same article the Enterprise says that Owens Valley is forty miles long while in reality it is over 100 miles long.

COLONEL QUARITCH, V.C.

CHAPTER XIX.

"GOOD-BY TO YOU, EDWARD."

It was on the day following the one upon which Harold proposed to Ida that Edward Cossey returned to Boisingham. His father had so far recovered from his attack as to be at last prevailed upon to allow his departure, being chiefly moved thereto by the supposition that Cossey & Son's branch establishments were suffering from his son's absence.

"Well," he said, in his high, piercing voice, "business is business, and must be attended to, so perhaps you had better go. They talk about the fleeting character of things, but there is one thing that never changes, and that is money. Money is immortal; men may come and men may go, but money goes on forever. Hee! hee! money is the honey pot, and men are the flies; and some get their fill and some stick their wings, but the honey is always there, so never mind the flies. No, never mind me either; you go and look after the honey, Edward. Money—honey; honey—money, they rhyme, don't they? And look here; by the way, if you get a chance—and the world is full of chances to men who have plenty of money—mind you don't forget to pay out that half pay colonel—what's his name?—Quaritch. He played our family a dirty trick, and there's your poor aunt Julia in a lunatic asylum to this moment, and a constant source of expense to us."

And so Edward bade his estimable parent farewell, and departed. Nor in truth did he require any admonition from Mr. Cossey, senior, to make him anxious to do Col. Quaritch an ill turn if the opportunity should serve. Mrs. Quest, in her numerous affectionate letters, had more than once, possibly for reasons of her own, given him a full and vivid resume of the local gossip about the colonel and Ida, who were, she said, according to common report, engaged to be married. Now, absence had not by any means cooled Edward's devotion to Miss de la Molle, which was a sincere one enough in its own way. On the contrary, the longer he was away from her the more his passion grew, and with it a vigorous undergrowth of jealousy. He had, it is true, Ida's implied promise that she would marry him, if he choose to ask her; but on this he put no great reliance. Hence his hurry to return to Boisingham.

Leaving London by an afternoon train, he reached Boisingham about half past 6, and in pursuance of an arrangement already made, went to dine with the Quests. When he reached the house he found Belle alone in the drawing room, for her husband, having come in late, was still dressing; but somewhat to his relief he had no opportunity of private conversation with her, for a servant was in the room, attending to the fire, which would not burn. The dinner passed off quietly enough, though there was an ominous look about the lady's face which he, being familiar with these signs of the feminine weather, did not altogether like. After dinner, however, Mr. Quest excused himself, saying that he had promised to attend a local concert in aid of the funds for the restoration of the damaged pinnacle of the parish church, and he was left alone with the lady.

Then it was that all her pent up passion broke out. She overwhelmed him with her affection, she told him that her life had been a blank while he was away, she reproached him with the scarcity and coldness of his letters, and generally went on in a way with which he was but too well accustomed, and if the truth must be told, heartily tired. His mood was an irritable one, and to-night the whole thing wearied him beyond bearing.

"Come, Belle," he said, at last, "for goodness sake be a little more rational. You are getting too old for this sort of tomfoolery, you know."

She sprung up and faced him, her eyes flashing and her breast heaving with jealous anger. "What do you mean?" she said. "Are you tired of me?"

"I did not say that," he answered, "but as you have started the subject, I must tell you that I think all this has gone far enough. Unless it is stopped, I believe we shall both be ruined. I am sure that your husband is becoming suspicious, and as I have told you again and again, if once the business gets to my father's ears, he will disinherit me."

Belle stood quite still till he had finished. She had assumed her favorite attitude, and crossed her arms behind her back, and her sweet, childish face was calm and very white.

"What is the good of making excuses and telling me what is not true, Edward?" she said. "One never hears a man who loves a woman talk like that; prudence comes with weariness, and men grow virtuous when there is nothing more to gain. You are tired of me. I have seen it a long time, but like a poor blind fool I have tried not to believe it. It is not a great reward to a woman who has given her whole life to a man, but perhaps it is as much as she can expect, for I do not want to be unjust to you. I am the most to blame, because we need never take a false step except of our own free will."

"Well, well," he said, impatiently, "what of it?"

"Only this, Edward. I have still a little pride left, and if you are tired of me, why—go."

He tried hard to prevent it, but do what he would, a look of relief struggled into his face. She saw it, and it made her wild with jealous anger.

"You need not look so happy, Edward; it is scarcely decent; and, besides, you have not heard all that I have to say. I know what all this arises from. You are in love with Ida de la Molle. Now there I draw the line. You may leave me if you like, but you shall not marry Ida while I am alive to prevent it. That is more than I can bear. Besides, like a wise woman, she has fallen in love with Col. Quaritch, who is worth two of you, Edward Cossey."

"I do not believe it," he answered; "and what right have you to say that I am in love with Miss de la Molle? And if I am in love with her, how can you prevent me from marrying her if I choose?"

"Try, and you will see," she answered, with a little laugh. "And now, as the curtain has dropped, and it is all over between us, why, the best thing that we can do is to put out the lights and go to bed," and she laughed again and courtesied with much assumed playfulness. "Good night, Mr. Cossey; good night, and good-by."

He held out his hand. "Come, Belle," he said, "don't let us part like this."

She shook her head, and once more put her arms behind her. "No," she answered, "I will not take your hand. Of my own free will I will never touch it again, for to me it is like the hand of the dead. Good-by, once more; good-by to you, Edward, and to all the happiness that I ever had. I built up all my life upon my love for you, and you have shattered it like glass. I do not reproach you; you have followed after your nature and I must follow mine, and in time all things will come right—in the grave. I shall not trouble you any more, provided that you do not try to marry Ida, for that I will not bear. And now go, for I am very tired," and turning she rang the bell for the servant to show him out.

In another minute he was gone. She listened till she heard the front door close behind him, and then she gave way to her grief, and flinging herself upon the sofa, covered her face with her hands and sobbed and moaned bitterly, weeping for the past, and weeping, too, for the long desolate years that were to come. Poor woman! do not let us judge her too hardly, for whatever was the measure of her sin, it had assuredly found her out, as our sins always do find us out in the end. She had loved this man with a passion which has no parallel in the hearts of well ordered and well brought up women. She had never really lived till this fatal passion took possession of her, and now that its object had deserted her, her heart felt as though it had died within her. In that short half hour she suffered more than many women do in their whole lives; but the paroxysm passed, and she rose pale and trembling, with set teeth and blazing eyes.

"He had better be careful," she said to herself; "he may go, but if he tries to marry Ida I will keep my word—yes, for her sake as well as his."

When Edward Cossey came to consider the position, which he did seriously on the following morning, he did not find it very satisfactory. To begin with, he was not altogether a heartless man, and such a scene as that which he had passed through on the previous evening was in itself quite enough to upset his nerves. At one time, at any rate, he had been much attached to Mrs. Quest; he had never borne her any violent affection—that had all been on her side; but still he had been fond of her, and if he could have done so, would probably have married her. Even now he was attached to her, and would have been glad to remain her friend if she would have allowed it. But then came the time when her heroics commenced to weary him, and he on his side began to fall in love with Ida de la Molle, and as he drew back so she came forward, till at length he was worn out, and things culminated as has been described. He was sorry for her too, knowing how deeply she was attached to him, though it is probable that he did not in the least realize the extent to which she suffered, for neither men nor women who have intentionally or otherwise been the cause of intense mental anguish to one of the opposite sex ever do quite realize this. They, not unnaturally, measure the trouble by the depth of their own, and are therefore very apt to come to erroneous conclusions. Of course, we are now speaking of cases where all the real passion is on one side, and indifference or comparative indifference on the other; for where it is mutual the grief will in natures of equal depth be mutual also.

At any rate, Edward Cossey was quite sensitive enough to feel the parting with Mrs. Quest acutely, and perhaps he felt the manner of it even more than the fact of the separation. Then came another consideration. He was, it is true, free from his entanglement, which was in itself an enormous relief, but the freedom was of a conditional nature. Belle had threatened trouble in the most decisive tones should he attempt to carry out his secret purpose, which she had not been slow to divine, of marrying Ida. From some occult reason, at least to him it seemed occult, the idea of this alliance was peculiarly distasteful to her, though no doubt the true explanation was that she believed, and not inaccurately, that it was in order to bring it about that he was bent upon deserting her. The question with him was, would she or would she not attempt to put her threat into execution? It certainly seemed to him difficult to imagine what steps she could take to that end, seeing that any such steps would necessarily involve her own exposure, and that too when there was nothing to gain, and when all hopes of thereby securing him for herself had passed away.

Nor did he seriously believe that she would attempt anything of the sort. It is one thing for a woman to make such threats in the acute agony of her jealousy and quite another for her to carry them out in cold blood. Looking at the matter from a man's point of view, it seemed to him extremely improbable that when the occasion came she would attempt such a move. He forgot how much more violently, when once it has taken possession of her being, the storm of passion sweeps through such a woman's heart than through a man's, and how utterly reckless to all consequence the former sometimes becomes. For there are women for whom all things melt in that white heat of anguished jealousy—honor, duty, conscience, and the restraint of religion, and of these Belle Quest was one.

But of this he was not aware, and though he recognized a risk, he saw in it no sufficient reason to make him stay his hand. For day by day the strong desire to make Ida his wife had grown upon him, till at last it possessed him body and soul. For a long while the intent had been smoldering in his breast, and the tale that he now heard, to the effect that Col. Quaritch had been beforehand with him, had blown it to a flame. Ida was ever present in his thoughts, even at night he could not be rid of her, for, when he slept, her vision, dark eyed and beautiful, came stealing down his dreams. She was his heaven, and if by any ladder known to man he might climb thereto, thither he would climb. And so he set his teeth and vowed that, Mrs. Quest or no Mrs. Quest, he would set his fortune upon the hazard of the die, ay, and win it, even if he loaded the dice.

While he was still thinking thus, standing at his window and gazing out on to the market place of the quiet little town, he suddenly saw Ida herself driving up in her pony carriage. It was a wet and windy day, and the rain was on her cheek, and the wind tossed a little lock of her brown hair. The cob was pulling, and her proud face was set, as she concentrated her energies upon holding him. Never to Edward Cossey had she looked more beautiful. His heart beat fast at the sight of her, and whatever doubts might have lingered in his mind, vanished. Yes, he would claim her promise and marry her.

Presently the pony carriage pulled up at his door, and the boy who was sitting behind got down and rang the bell. He stepped back from the window, wondering what it could be.

"Will you please give that note to Mr. Cossey," said Ida, as the door opened, "and ask him to send an answer?" and she was gone.

The note was from the squire, sealed with his big seal (the squire always sealed his letters in the old fashioned way), and contained an invitation to himself to shoot on the morrow. "George wants me to do a little partridge driving," it ended, "and to brush through one or two of the small covers. There will only be Col. Quaritch beside yourself and George, but I hope that you will have a fair rough day. If I don't hear from you, I shall suppose that you are coming, so don't trouble to write."

While he was still thinking

"Oh, yes, I will go," said Edward. "Confound that Quaritch. At any rate I can show him how to shoot, and what is more, I will have it out with him about my aunt.'

CHAPTER XX.

THE COLONEL GOES OUT SHOOTING.

The next morning was fine and still, one of those lovely autumn days of which we get four or five in the course of a season. After breakfast Harold Quaritch strolled down his garden, stood himself against a gate to the right of Dead Man's Mount, and looked at the scene. All about him, their foliage yellowing to its fall, were the giant oaks, which were the pride of the country side, and so quiet was the air that not a leaf upon them stirred. The only sounds that reached his ears were the tappings of the nut hatches as they sought their food in the rough crannies of the bark and the occasional falling of a rich ripe acorn from its lofty place on to the frosted grass beneath. The sunshine shone bright, but with a chastened heat, the squirrels scrambled up the oaks, and high in the blue air, the rooks pursued their path. It was a beautiful morning, for summer is never more sweet than on its deathbed, and yet it filled him with solemn thoughts. How many autumns had those old trees seen and how many would they still see long after his eyes had lost their sight. And if they were old, how old was the Dead Man's Mount there to his left. Old, indeed! for he had discovered it was mentioned in Doomsday Book, and by that name. And what was it—a boundary hill, a natural formation, or, as its name implied, a funeral barrow? He had half a mind to dig one day and find out, that is if he could get anybody to dig for him, for the people about Honham were so firmly convinced that Dead Man's Mount was haunted, a reputation which it had owned from time immemorial, that nothing would have persuaded them to touch it.

"Halloo, colonel, the squire hopes you'll go in and have a glass of something before you start," said George; so accordingly he went, not to "have a glass of something," but on the chance of seeing Ida. In the vestibule he found the old gentleman busily engaged in writing an enormous letter.

"Halloo, colonel," he hallooed, without getting up, "glad to see you. Excuse me for a few moments, will you? I want to get this off my mind. Here, Ida! Ida! Ida!" he shouted, "here's Col. Quaritch."

"Good gracious, father," said that young lady, arriving in a hurry, "you are bringing the house down," and then she turned round and greeted Harold. It was the first time that they had met since the eventful evening described a chapter or two back, so the occasion might be considered a little awkward, at any rate he felt it so.

"How do you do, Col. Quaritch?" she said, quite simply, giving him her hand. There was nothing in the words, and yet he felt that he was very welcome. For when a woman really loves a man there is about her an atmosphere of softness and tender meaning which cannot be mistaken. Sometimes it is only perceptible to the favored individual himself, but more generally is to be discerned by any person of ordinary shrewdness. A very short course of observation in general society will convince the reader of the justice of this observation, and when once he gets to know the signs of the weather he will probably light upon more affairs of the heart than were ever meant for his investigation.

This softness, or atmospheric influence, or subdued glow of affection radiating from a light within, was clearly enough visible in Ida that morning, and certainly it made our friend the colonel unspeakably happy to see it.

"Are you fond of shooting?" she asked, presently.

"Yes, very, and have been all my life."

"Are you a good shot?" she asked again.

"I call that a rude question," he answered, smiling.

"Yes, it is, but I want to know."

"Well," said Harold, "I suppose that I am pretty fair, that is at rough shooting; I have never had much practice at driven birds and that kind of sport."

"I am glad of that."

"Why, it does not much matter. One goes out shooting for the sport of the thing."

"Yes, I know, but Mr. Edward Cossey," and she shrunk visibly as she uttered the name, "is coming, and he is a very good shot and very conceited about it. I want you to beat him if you can—will you try?"

"Well," said Harold, "I don't at all like shooting against a man. It is not sportsmanlike, you know; and, besides, if Mr. Cossey is a crack shot, I dare say that I shall be nowhere; but I will shoot as well as I can."

"Do you know, it is very feminine, but I would give anything to see you beat him!" and she nodded and laughed, whereupon Harold Quaritch vowed in his heart that if it in him lay he would not disappoint her.

At that moment Edward Cossey's fast trotting horse drew up at the door with a prodigious crunching of gravel, and Edward himself entered, looking very handsome and very pale. He was admirably dressed, that is to say, his shooting clothes were beautifully made and very new looking, and so were his boots, and so was his hat, and so were his hammerless guns, of which he brought a pair. There exists a certain class of sportsmen who appear to have just walked out of a sporting tailor's shop, and to this class Edward Cossey belonged. Everything about him was of the best and newest and most expensive kind possible; even his guns were just down from a famous maker, and the best that could be had for love or money, having cost exactly a hundred and forty guineas the pair. Indeed, he presented a curious contrast to his rival. The colonel had certainly nothing new looking about him, an old tweed coat, an old hat, with a piece of gut still twined round it, a sadly frayed bag full of brown cartridges, and, last of all, an old gun with all the brown worn off the barrels, original cost, £17 10s. And yet there was no possibility of making any mistake as to which of the two looked more of a gentleman, or, indeed, more of a sportsman.

Edward Cossey shook hands with Ida, but when the colonel was advancing to give him his hand he turned and spoke to the squire, who had at length finished his letter, so that no greeting passed between them. At the time Harold did not know if this move was or was not accidental.

Presently they started, Edward Cossey attended by his man with the second gun.

"Halloo! Cossey," sung out the squire after him, "it isn't much use your bringing two guns for this sort of work. I don't preserve much here, you know, at least not now. You will only get a few cock pheasants and a few brace of partridges."

"Oh, thank you," he answered, "I always like to have a second gun in case I should want it. It's no trouble, you know."

"All right," said the squire, "Ida and I will come down with the luncheon to the spinny. Good-by."

After crossing the moat Edward Cossey walked by himself, followed by his man and a very fine retriever, and the colonel talked to George, who was informing him that Mr. Cossey was a "pretty shot, he was, but rather snappy over it," till they came to a field of white turnips.

Into the details of the sport that followed we need not enter, beyond saying that the colonel, to his huge delight, never shot better in his life. Indeed, with the exception of one rabbit and a hen pheasant that flopped up right beneath his feet, he scarcely missed, though he took the shots as they came. Edward Cossey also shot well, and with one exception missed nothing, but then he never took a difficult shot if he could avoid it. The exception was a woodcock which rose in front of George, who was walking down an outside belt with the beaters. He had two barrels at it, and missed it, and on it came among the tree tops, passed where Edward Cossey was standing, about half way down the belt, giving him a difficult chance with the first barrel and a clear one with the second. Bang! bang! and on came the woodcock, flying low, but at a tremendous speed, straight at the colonel's head, a most puzzling shot. However, he fired, and to his joy (and what joy is there like to the joy of a sportsman who has just killed a woodcock which everybody has been popping at), down it came with a thump almost at his feet.

WAKED UP EFFECTUALLY.

A lethargic, dormant condition of the liver is hardly to be overcome with drastic cathartics and nauseous cholagogues. A gentler, pleasanter and far more effective means exists of arousing the organ when somnolent. This is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, vouched for by the medical fraternity, tested by the public for many years. A resumption by the biliary organ of its secretive function, with the activity attendant upon health, a return to regularity of the bowels and a renewal of digestion, are the no less happy and certain results of using the Bitters systematically. Its laxative effect is never painful and drenching, its tendency being rather to perpetuate regularity than to produce a copious action. Malaria, nervousness, debility, kidney troubles and neuralgia it subdues effectually.

Eli Zane is a lucky man.

He has just drawn a twentieth of the second capital prize of $100,000 in The Louisiana State Lottery and finds himself the possessor of $5,000. He cannot contain himself for joy.

One minute he thinks he will buy a farm, the next that he will travel, and the next that he will set himself up in some business. The latter idea is the one that finds most favor with him, and he will doubtless, soon open a well-stocked grocery store.

Eli lives at No. 1306 Thompson street, and he was sensible and lucky enough to invest, secretly, one dollar in ticket No. 12,122 in The Louisiana State Lottery. That ticket drew the $100,000 prize, and the news, communicated to Mr. Zane immediately after the drawing, threw him into great excitement.

He did not feel quite like a rich man, however, until he got the money into his hands. Then he began to imagine that he could buy up the whole earth.

"Am I happy?" he repeated after an Item reporter, who called on him. "Well, I should smile! What do you expect of a man who gets $5,000 for one dollar? Why, I feel as rich as Croesus. I knew I would strike luck if I continued investing in The Louisiana State Lottery."—Philadelphia (Pa.) Item, January 31.

BRIGHT'S DISEASE CURED.

About two years ago our daughter had congestion of the kidneys, which developed into Bright's Disease. Her body was swollen to an enormous size—measuring 45 inches around the waist, and 18 inches below the knee. After physicians had given up her case, I determined to have her try Dr. Kennedy's "FAVORITE REMEDY," of Rondout, N. Y. Gradually the swelling was reduced from 45 to 29 inches. She began to gain Strength, and was able to walk without fatigue. We do not know how to express our gratitude for what it has done for our child. TO LIVE LONG.

How to Prolong Life After Middle Age. Views of an Eminent London Physician, Whose Specialty is Diseases of the Aged.

John Gardner, M. D., is a London Physician who makes a specialty of the treatment of diseases of elderly persons. In a recent book upon this subject, Dr. Gardner says:

"A healthy and vigorous state of every part and every organ is essential to the health and well being of the whole system 'To grow old gracefully,' is not the common lot of all. With advancing years come increased infirmities they are by no means inevitable, and their presence is due to the failure to keep up to their work the various organs of the body. The study of the body by scientists furnishes unquestionable evidence that the duration of human life may be prolonged to a hundred years."

Why, then, do so few live to that age; and why after middle life—and often before—is there so much suffering from nervousness, rheumatism, feebleness, lack of appetite, sleeplessness, and debility? Because long life or overwork has weakened the nervous system. Rev. T. Williston, the famous author of "Christ's Millenial Reign," when eighty four years old, suffered with indigestion and rheumatic affections. His attention was called fortunately to Paine's Celery Compound. A free use of that great medicine for the nerves cured him, and made a great improvement in his general health.

This grand discovery is an unequaled medicine for the aged. It produces life and energy and is a marvelous preserver of the fire and vigor of youth. There is nothing like it for strengthening the nerves, and curing the diseases to which old folks are specially subject. It is truly called invaluable by those who have made a special study of diseases of elderly people.

FASHIONABLE SOCIETY.

The trying ordeals which fashionable society imposes on its devotees are enough to severely test the physical strength and endurance of the most robust. Irregular and late hours, over-rich and indigestible food, late suppers, the fatigue of the ball-room, the bad air of the illy-ventilated, overcrowded theatre, are each, in themselves, sufficient to upset the system and ruin the health of the delicate and sensitive. Combined, they can hardly fail, if persisted in, to seriously impair the health of the hardiest. Ladies generally possess less powers of endurance than their male consorts, and so the sooner succumb to these deleterious influences. They become pale, haggard and debilitated, and constantly experience a sense of lassitude—that "tired feeling," as so many express it. The least exertion fatigues them. Various neuralgic and other pains harrass and distress the sufferer. Headache, backache, "bearing-down" sensations, and "female weaknesses" follow and sorely afflict the sufferer.

As an invigorating, restorative tonic, soothing cordial and bracing nervine, for debilitated and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has no equal. In fact, it is the only medicine for the peculiar weaknesses and ailments incident to females, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from its manufacturers, that it will, in every case, give satisfaction or its price ($1.00) will be promptly refunded. It improves digestion, invigorates the system, enriches the blood, dispels aches and pains, produces refreshing sleep, dispels melancholy and nervousness, and builds up both the flesh and strength of those reduced below a healthy standard. It is a legitimate medicine—not a beverage. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to sour or ferment in the stomach and cause distress. It is as peculiar in its composition as it is marvelous in its remedial results. Therefore, don't be put off with some worthless compound easily, but dishonestly, recommended to be "just as good," that the dealer may make more profit. "Favorite Prescription" is incomparable. The manufacturers' unprecedented offer to guarantee satisfaction in every case, or money refunded, ought to convince every invalid of this fact. A Book, on Woman's Ailments, and their Self-cure (160 pages), sent under seal, in plain envelope, for ten cents in stamps. A NEST AND A HOME.

See! is pretty, fragile thing
That some bird has made;
With what careful fashioning
Every twig was laid!
Filled with happy song by day,
And by night with rest,
Now 'tis but that useless thing—
A deserted nest.

See yon empty dwelling-place;
Once it was a home;
Children's happy, dancing feet
In and out did come.
Now the curtains close are drawn,
Death hath been a guest;
There no step is heard; 'tis but—
"A deserted nest!"

Where have flown the joyous birds
That the nest did weave?
Tell me why so fair a place
Did its inmates leave?
Do they miss its sheltering wall
Where they took their rest?
Do they pine in sadness for
Their deserted nest?

Nay! on strong and gladsome wing
Did they take their flight;
Far in sunny lands they sing
Songs of true delight.
Pitiful would be their cry,
Sad each feathered breast,
Should they now be forced to seek
Their deserted nest!

So the dear ones "gone before"
From an earthly home,
Wait upon the "shining shore"
Till we, too, shall come;
In that safe and blest abode
Now they sing and rest;
Would'st thou call them back to claim
Their "deserted nest?"

HEALTH NOTES.

A Very Common Delusion Which Is Mere Moonshine

Treatment of Small Wounds—A Snuff for Nasal Catarrh—Preparation of Children's Drinking Water—The Sick-Room—Infant Apparel.

In a cotemporary there recently appeared a highly sensational item about "a ferocious cat." "It sucks the breath of a Beverly child with nearly fatal results." It appears that a little girl was found asleep with a cat lying on its breast with its head close to her mouth, "sucking her breath." "The cat was driven off and the little one fainted away, and it was feared that she would die." Of all the delusions which possess mankind—and there are almost as many as there are grains of sand—this is one of the most absurd. We are living in what is called the enlightened age, but such a yarn as this, reported with an air of credulity, belies the fact. There is absolutely no foundation for the delusion; it is pure and simple moonshine. A baby might sleep with a cradle full of cats without fear of losing its breath. As far as the danger from them is concerned, cats are as harmless as dogs, and every one knows that the latter are common bedfellows of children. A good, clean, healthy dog or cat would not, by sleeping with it, threaten the health of a child, any more than would its little brother or sister. These animals are, of course, liable to diseases not easily detected by their owners; they are also often the the carriers of infectious disease. Again, they throw off impurities in the breath and through the skin, as do the highest order of animals. The sleeping room of the average child is too small, and does not hold pure air enough for him alone; and so another occupant, be it a child or a dog or a cat, would have an unhealthy influence—one would be as bad as either of the others. For these reasons it is not well to allow pets to sleep with children, and for none other. The cat lay on the chest of the Beverly child. The little one's breathing, in consequence of the pressure, became laborious. Beyond all doubt, frightful dreams were also induced. In one of them the child is suddenly awakened, and in a state of terror very likely it did faint away; it would not have been surprising had a convulsion come on. Assuredly there is nothing mysterious in this case, and the symptoms were but the natural result of the cause; only a very little common sense is needed to plainly trace one to the other. But superstition and common sense are incompatable; and when they occur together superstition has the call.

A small cut is often held to be too trifling for treatment, and so is practically neglected. A small wound upon the hands, as one made by a pin, sometimes proves very dangerous, as appears from the following case, the facts of which were developed at a coroner's inquest in London recently: It was shown by the evidence that the deceased and his sweetheart were, as the latter said, "larking," when she happened to scratch his thumb. He disregarded the scratch, which festered and resulted in blood-poisoning. He was admitted to the hospital, became delirious, and died four days later. Death was due to blood-poisoning following the wound in the thumb. The jury returned a verdict of "accidental death." Fortunately, such cases as this are very rare. The hands of every one come in contact with substances which are more or less poisonous. An unbroken skin on any part of the body is a very decided barrier to absorption, and that on the hands, thickened and hardened, is especially impenetrable. The bodies of victims of certain maladies are in the most intense degree poisonous, and hence are dangerous to touch unless care is used. In making autopsies on such, if there is a hangnail on either of the fingers, or the skin is otherwise broken, unless some especial precaution is taken, blood-poisoning is very likely to result in consequence of the absorption of the fluids. But while the skin remains intact there is little or no danger of such results. Physicians before making autopsies, and students before dissection, generally paint any little scratches, hang-nails, etc., with collodion, and afterward lubricate the hands well with sweet oil or some other oily agent, which closes the pores in the skin and obviates the danger of absorption. If they cut or prick their hands while at work they rush at once to the sink, hastily wash the parts, and then, unless the wound is bleeding freely, suck the same. If water is not handy for washing, a hasty wipe is all that is done before the lips are applied to the wound. Under those conditions the prick of a needle is the most dangerous, for by that means the poison is carried in deeply, and the wound, being very small, closes tightly and shuts in the same. Ordinarily a person receiving a scratch from a pin or needle, or other small wound from a much-used instrument, will do well to bathe it thoroughly in very hot water, and afterward, until it is healed, keep on some simple ointment or salve, so as to obviate any danger of poisonous absorption while handling foods which have become tainted, or other suspicious substances.

A snuff which is much used in Germany for nasal catarrh is composed of the following ingredients: Menthol, three parts; boric acid, two parts; powdered orris root, five parts; powdered sugar, ten parts; powdered coffee, thirty parts; powdered milk sugar, fifty parts. Snuffs as a rule do more harm than good in catarrh, for the reason that they are so generally irritating. The first few applications of such are likely to act pleasingly by "clearing out the head," but if persisted in an irritation is almost always set up, which narrows the nasal passages and makes the user much more uncomfortable than he was at first. This German snuff is a mild preparation and would not irritate except in very exceptional cases. And yet, some patients, with peculiarly sensitive linings to the nasal passages, could not use it. Its most active agent is menthol, which is of positive value in the treatment of catarrh of the nose when rightly used. Taken all in all, it would be safe for a victim of this annoying affection to try this snuff if he feels like doing so. If it does him good he would be justified in using it occasionally—say, take a pinch three or four times a day, and, of course, he would have sense enough to stop it if it aggravated his trouble.

When a young child under six months of age is taken out for an airing during the present season it should be carried in the arms. If trundled in a baby carriage, even if very carefully clothed, it is more liable to take cold than if borne as advised. All well children ought to have an outing every day, but when it is storming or intensely cold there would be danger for them in such exposure. In damp, stormy weather they should, of course, be kept housed, and in a comfortably warm room, ventilated through the adjoining rooms, which are also heated so as to dry the incoming air. When it is very cold a good plan is to open wide the windows of some room into which the sun is shining until the air therein is as pure as the outside air, then to close the windows and bring the baby in well wrapped up, and walk about with him for awhile. The majority of mothers keep the nursery much too warm and improperly ventilated. When it is heated by steam or by furnace the air is generally very dry and irritating to the lining of the air passages. As a consequence coughs are of frequent occurrence, for which the little victims are dosed with sirup of squills and the like, whereas pure air is the one essential to effect a cure.

Babies are often thirsty, like their mothers, and need drinking water. That is not always easy to obtain in its natural state. Slightly impure water, which strong adults might use without injury, would be likely to do babies considerable harm. The best and safest way is to boil for at least twenty minutes all water given to them. After that is done the water should be filtered, bottled and set away in a cool place. A filter which does its work perfectly is a costly affair; nor is such a one needed if the water has been properly boiled. Coarse filteration is all that is necessary, and that can be effected by using absorbent cotton; in buying the same make sure that it has not been medicated. A wad of this packed into the bottom of a funnel furnishes a very good and convenient filter. When the water is from a general supply, as in cities and towns, the danger of lead-poisoning from the pipes must not be overlooked, and the faucet should be kept open for at least twenty minutes before the drinking water is drawn.

When a person becomes ill and takes to his bed, about the first thing done is to darken the room, and if a flash of sunlight gets into it before he has begun to recover, it will be only after the attending physician has delivered to patients and care-takers a medical lecture, and in wearisome detail discoursed upon the importance of natural light to life and health. And this fault is almost universal despite the fact that even the newspapers have called attention to it time and time again. Certainly no place could be more dismal and depressing than a dark sick-room, and perhaps for that reason the patient, especially if he is a man, often insists upon his surroundings being made as suggestive of suffering as possible. Of course there are hot days in summer when comfort actually demands for a time that the curtains be drawn, and possibly the blinds closed and the dazzling sunshine shut out; but when it comes to making it a rule to darken the sick room, nothing could be more unwise. Sunlight is one of nature's most powerful disinfectants, having a destructive influence upon those minute poisons which abound in the atmospheres of many sick-rooms. It also warms and rarefies the air, and has a direct influence upon the health. Not only that, but when a sick-room is kept darkened it is sure to become untidy. Taken all in all, this prevalent fault is most pernicious in its results. Where patients complain of the light, set a screen at the side of the bed; or, if there is none such in the house, call the "clothes horse" into service; stand it up and then throw a shawl or two over it. A very little ingenuity and effort will overcome the annoyance and satisfy the patient. Then let the sunlight stream in all day long if possible. It will prove in any sort of sickness one of the most powerful of remedies.

All the clothing about a baby should be loose, and the tight band, with which it is generally inflicted, is not only not needed—certainly not after the second week of life—but it is positively hurtful. There is a prevailing idea among mothers that the baby's abdomen needs a support, a notion which is simply absurd. To keep the body comfortably warm, and with soft, roomy clothing, is the essential. A woolen undervest, preferably knit, so as to secure elasticity, reaching to the hips, should take the place of the old-fashioned "band." As for the clothing, Dr. Yale makes some very wise suggestions. He recommends three garments, beside the napkins, all covering the neck and shoulders and reaching ten or twelve inches below the feet. The outer garment, as well as the middle one, is a little larger in every dimension than that beneath it, so that no binding shall take place. They are all cut in the girdless pattern called "princess." The inner one has sleeves, and may be of cotton flannel or very soft wool flannel. If wool is used, care must be taken against shrinking in washing. The next garment has no sleeves and no seams at the arm-holes to insure against pressure there. The material is wool flannel. The outer one is the usual dress, with high neck and sleeves, the details of which may be modified to suit taste. Thus, except the sleeves, the thickness is the same throughout. At night a garment like the one above described and a napkin only are worn. These three garments are placed one within the other before the dressing commences, pains being taken to avoid wrinkles and folds, and they are put upon the child as but one garment with very little trouble. They are removed with equal ease.—Boston Herald.

BISMARCK EPISODES.

Extracts from an Interesting Book Published in Germany.

I have received an advance copy of the third volume of H. V. Sybel's "History of the German Empire." In common with the volumes already before the public, it contains a number of episodes and anecdotes hitherto not generally known. Probably the most interesting chapters refer to the relations between Prince Bismarck and Count Rechberg, then Prussian and Austrian Ambassadors, respectively, at the German (Frankfort) Diet. Prince Bismarck (then Herr Von Bismarck Schonhausen) soon found out that Count Rechberg was hot-tempered and passionate, but in the main honorable and good. Count Rechberg, on his side, cordially disliked Prussia and its astute representative, but did his best all the same to keep on amicable terms with his colleague. Both officially and socially there was, however, plenty of friction between the two. On one occasion things came to such a pitch that Count Rechberg entirely losing his self-control, passionately exclaimed: "One of my friends shall wait on you in the morning." "Why all this unnecessary delay," Herr Von Bismarck coolly replied, "in all probability you have a pair of pistols handy. Let us settle the matter immediately. While you get the things ready I shall write a report about the whole transaction, which, in case I am killed, I request you to forward to Berlin." Both set about their work. When Bismarck had finished he handed the sheet to Count Rechberg, requesting him to examine the same. Rechberg's passion had in the meantime given way to sober reflection. After having perused the report he said: "What you say here is quite correct; but is it really worth while to fight a duel for such a reason?" "That is exactly my opinion," was Bismarck's answer, and the matter ended. One day Count Rechberg called on the Prussian Ambassador to show him a dispatch from his government instructing the Count to vote with Prussia at the next meeting of the German Diet. Bismarck read the document and returned it to the Count, saying: "This is evidently a mistake." Rechberg in his turn looked at the sheet and changed color. Instead of the official letter he had by mistake handed to Bismarck the secret instructions he had received concurrently, calling upon him while openly countenancing Prussia to use his utmost endeavors to cause the other German States to vote against the measure. Here was Prince Bismarck's opportunity. How he used it the sequel will show. For a moment both statesmen looked at one another in silence. Then Bismarck said: "Don't be upset. You never intended giving me the letter. Ergo, you never gave it me; ergo, I know nothing about the whole matter." As a matter of fact, Bismarck never reported the letter to Berlin. But he gained Count Rechberg's confidence, in his eyes an important conquest.—Frankfort Cor. London News.

The Varied Value of Silver.

Silver, in its relative value to gold, has varied greatly at different times. In the days of the Patriarch Abraham it was 8 to 1; B. C. 1000 it was 12 to 1; B. C. 500 it was 13 to 1, and at the commencement of the Christian era it was 9 to 1. In the year 500 A. D. it was 18 to 1; in 1100 it was 8 to 1, and in 1400 it was 11 to 1. In 1454 gold was only six times more valuable than the precious white metal, silver, and within the next hundred years two pounds of silver could be exchanged evenly for one of gold. In 1600 gold was again worth ten times as much as its paler brother. In 1725 gold was thirteen times more valuable than silver, just as it was 500 years B. C. At the beginning of the present century it had risen in value to a higher point than at any time since 500 A. D., being fifteen times more valuable than silver. In 1876 the ratio of silver to gold was 20 to 1 and in 1886 it was at the highest point ever known, since which time it has gradually declined to 20 to 1.—St. Louis Republic.

Lowering the Record.

Mother (to her old maid daughter)—Why, Julia, what do you mean by using the family Bible in that way? You are scratching out figures in the record and inserting others.

Julia—It is a record of my birth, isn't it?

"Yes, it is."

"Well, I'm lowering the record."—Texas Siftings.

—In the New Hebrides there is a babel of tongues, but the Presbyterian missionaries have reduced twelve of them to writing. The seventeen missionaries laboring on the group are all busy with the work of translation.

GOLD-MINING IN CHINA.

Ten Thousand Men Who Dig Three Ounces of Gold a Day.

Minister Denby has sent to the State Department, in a recent report, a translation of an article which recently appeared in a native newspaper published at Shanghai, giving an account of the gold mining in Shanghai. It says:
